It must be understood that what we have said upon this point is said of stock fire companies. The law as to mutual companies, by reason of the lien given them, may be different; the law as to marine risks certainly is different. From the peculiar and hazardous nature of these risks, and the fact that the property is often on the high seas when insurance is effected, it has from early times been held that failures to disclose facts, not the subject of enquiry, stand upon the same footing as false answers to questions; and the natural resort of the courts in cases of fire insurance to the older principles of marine insurance, has led to much of the confusion upon the point under consideration. There is an obvious distinction between the two risks. In cases of insurance of land risks the property is at hand, and may be, and usually is, inspected by the agent of the insurer; and the risk, in connection with the statements of the application, is plain and definite. In these cases, and this is the important point in the matter, the insurer puts a long list of questions, to ascertain as fully as he desires, the character of the hazard to be assumed; and, upon satisfactory answers, he agrees to insure the property. He is safe, in the average run of fires, on this basis; and he therefore takes the risk of the effect of other facts of exposure which may not come under our head of concealment. There is thus a plain distinction between answers to enquiries and non-disclosure, where no questions are asked.

There are several other points in this important case which we had intended to examine; but the length of our note precludes our doing so at present. The subject may be resumed at another time.

It is proper to say that to have made an examination of particular cases in this note, would have extended it beyond proper limits. The writer has carefully studied the cases on this subject, and it is believed that, while the foregoing views are in conflict with some of the cases, they present a just result of the best authorities. Most of the cases are readily found in Mr. Bennett's Collection of Fire Insurance Cases, a third volume of which will soon be published. M. M. B.

Liability of Banks for Cashiers' Endorsements.

NATHAN MATTHEWS v. THE MASSACHUSETTS NATIONAL BANK.

Circuit Court of the United States, District of Massachusetts.

Hon. GEORGE F. SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge.

A bank loaned a sum of money to A., and innocently took as security therefor an instrument which purported to be a certificate of 200 shares of the stock of a railway company, issued by said company to the bank as collateral, but which was in fact a forgery, of which A. was the author. A., having made payment to the bank, the said instrument was re-delivered to him, with the signature of the cashier of the bank attached to the printed transfer on the back. Subsequently, A. obtained a loan of a sum of money from B., by using the same instrument as collateral. The forgery having been discovered, and A. having been convicted of obtaining money under false pretences, and having been indicted for the forgery, and adjudged a bankrupt, it was held, that B. was entitled to recover against the bank the damages he had sustained in lending money on an instrument which had thus received credit by being endorsed by the cashier of the bank.

SHEPLEY, J.—The defendants, the Massachusetts National Bank, loaned to one James A. Coe, $22,000, payable on call, with interest, taking from him his memorandum of indebtedness for that amount, with, as collateral security therefor, what purported to be a certificate of 200 shares of the capital stock of the Boston and Albany Railroad Company, issued to said Massachusetts National Bank as collateral. This instrument was originally a genuine certificate for two shares of the capital stock of the Boston and Albany Railroad Company, issued to H. E. Coe, but by false and forged erasures and interlineations had been so altered as to purport to be a certificate of 200 shares of its stock, issued by said railroad corporation to the Massachusettts National Bank as collateral.

The bank received the said certificate in good faith, and without any suspicion of its fradulent character, and in supposed fulfilment of the promise by James A. Coe to give, as security for the loan aforesaid, 200 shares of the capital stock of said railroad corporation. Subsequently, upon payment by said Coe to the bank, he received back his memorandum of indebtedness, and the cashier of the bank, for the purpose and with the intention of restoring the collateral to Coe, returned to him the fraudulent certificate, with the usual printed form of transfer on the back thereof, signed by H. K. Frothingham, cashier of said bank, in blank.

About two weeks after the surrender by the bank of this certificate to Coe, with the transfer in blank of the cashier on the back of it, the plaintiff, Matthews, pursuant to his agreement to loan Coe $25,000 on call, with interest, received from Coe, in good faith, the said fraudulent certificate, with the blank assignment on the back thereof, supposing the same to be a genuine certificate for 200 shares of said stock issued by the corporation, and duly transferred and assigned so as to enable him to obtain a new certificate therefor in his own name, and on receipt thereof loaned the sum of $25,000. The signature of the cashier was well known to Matthews, who correctly supposed the signature on the blank assignment to be genuine. Coe was tried and convicted for obtaining money on false pretences, and indictments for forgery are now pending against him, and he has been declared bankrupt. The next day, or very soon after the day when the money was loaned by Matthews, the fact first became known to plaintiff and defendants of the fraudulent alteration of the certificate before it came into possession of the defendants, and plaintiff thereupon notified the bank that he should hold it responsible for any loss sustained by him by reason of the premises. This action is brought for the recovery of the damages thus sustained.

The real question presented in the case is, whether the bank, by signing the blank transfer, has so far warranted the genuineness of the certificate that it is estopped from setting up the forgery as a defence to this action.

Defendants deny that the cashier had authority or right to bind the bank by the contract declared on.

Cashiers of a bank are held out to the public as having authority to act according to the general usage, practice and course of business conducted by the bank. Their acts, within the scope of such usage, practice and course of business, will, in general, bind the bank in favor of those persons possessing no other knowledge. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wallace, 604. One of the ordinary and well known duties of the cashier of a bank is the surrender of notes and securities upon payment, and his signature to the necessary transfers of securities or collaterals when in the form of bills of exchange, choses in action, stock certificates or similar securities for loans, which are personal property, is an act within the scope of the general usage, practice and course of business in which cashiers of a bank are held out to the public as having authority to act.

The signature of the cashier is, therefore, to be considered the signature of the bank, and the question returns whether such blank assignment on the back of the certificate by the bank is so far a warranty of the genuineness of the certificate that the bank is estopped from setting up the forgery as a defence. In the case of forged negotiable instruments it is well settled that the indorser warrants that the instrument itself and the antecedent signatures thereon are genuine. The indorser's liability in other cases is properly placed upon the ground of estoppel, and the reasoning which supports this rule of law would seem to apply with equal force and pertinency to the case of a transfer of a certificate of stock by indorsement in blank. Stock certificates are sold in open market like other securities, and form the basis of commercial transactions. The common practice of passing the title to stock by delivery of the certificate with blank assignment and power, has been repeatedly proved and sanctioned in cases which have come before the courts in New York.

The certificate in this case, as it came from the bank, contained on the same piece of paper, and on the back of the certificate, a blank assignment, which was all that was necessary to transfer the title of the stock as between the parties. The defendants must therefore be held to have intended and agreed that, whoever should present the certificate as issued from the bank, with the assignment executed in blank, should be entitled to fill up the blanks with his own name and to have a transfer of the stock made to himself on the books of the company. The certificate, accompanied with the transfer, executed in blank, was a species of negotiating of a peculiar character, but one well recognized in commercial transactions and judicial decisions, and absolutely essential, in the usage and necessities of modern commerce, to make such certificates available in commercial transactions. The signature is given for the purpose of transferring title, and whenever a blank is filled a contract of sale is established between the party who has signed the blank assignment and the person whose name is rightfully filled in as assignee.

The certificate purports to be a certificate that the bank held the shares as collateral, but does not show that they were collateral for a debt of Coe's to the bank. Such a certificate might, in the ordinary course and usage of dealing in stocks, pass through the hands of many successive purchasers. The possession of the certificate would afford no indication that the holder of it was the person who had originally transferred it to the bank as collateral. The mere words "as collateral" in the instrument, do not tend to put the purchaser on enquiry, except so far as it relates to the authority of the bank to dispose of the collateral as between the bank and its debtor. If this enquiry had been made, it would only have resulted in the information that the assignment was made in its actual form by the joint act and consent of the bank and the debtor. The name of the pledger was not stated in the certificate as required by the Massachusetts statute.

Nor can the bank contend, with any show of reason, that Matthews was negligent in not enquiring at the office of the railway corporation. If the duty of making such enquiry was incumbent upon any one, it was surely incumbent upon the bank to ascertain the genuineness of the instrument before they gave currency to it, and lulled suspicion and doubt by the responsibility of their own signature. The answer to all the positions taken by the defendant as to notice to Matthews from the words "as collateral" in the instrument, is, that there is nothing to connect Coe with these words—there is nothing on the face of the paper, and there was nothing in the fact of the possession of the instrument by Coe to show that he was the person for whose debt the stock was held as collateral.

The negligent act which specially imposes upon the defendants a liability in this case, is that they delivered the forged instrument to Coe, authenticated by their signature in blank to a transfer, thus giving to it a currency and respectability which it would not have possessed had they made the transfer directly to Coe. Thus the bank put it in the power of Coe to commit the fraud on Matthews, on which this suit is founded. The bank substituted their trust in the honesty of Coe for the control which the bank should have exercised itself over the transfer of the instrument, and should suffer the loss consequent upon his betrayal of the trust, rather than to suffer it to fall upon an innocent stranger.

One or two innocent parties must suffer in this case by the fraud of Coe. Under similar circumstances, courts have repeatedly held that the party must suffer who has exhibited the greatest degree of negligence. The bank is precluded from setting up the fact of the forgery of the instrument, because it would be a wrong on its own part and an injury to others whose conduct has been influenced by the acts and omissions of the bank. An estoppel is a salutary rule which prevents a man from proving that to be false which he has once represented to be true, when others have acted on the faith of his representation.

The fact that Matthews has also a right of action against Coe, who is a convict and a bankrupt, does not preclude him from a remedy against the bank.

Upon the facts as agreed in this case, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, and, according to the agreement of parties, the case is to be referred to an auditor to assess the damages.

JUDGMENT FOR PLAINTIFF.

Bankrupt Act—"Commencement of Proceedings."

In re DARIAS ROGERS.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Kansas.

Hon. C. G. FOSTER, District Judge.

1. Bankrupt Act—"Commencement of Proceedings."—Section 38 of the bankrupt act, concerning the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, construed to mean the filing of a petition sustained by proofs of the act of bankruptcy, and of the claim of the petitioning creditor.

2. ———. ———. No Order to Show Cause can legally issue against the debtor until such proofs sustaining the petition are filed and a prima facie case made.

3. ———. ———. An Order to Show Cause, issued without such proofs, is illegal and void, and does not constitute a commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy within the meaning of the act.

This is an application by H. B. Stoddard, a judgment-creditor of the bankrupt, for an order that the assignee sell certain real estate of the bankrupt and apply the proceeds to the payment of the petitioner's judgment, which was recovered on the 20th day of December, A. D. 1873, in the District Court of Neosho county. The petitioner claims that his judgment was recovered before proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, and is therefore a prior lien upon the real estate of the bankrupt. On the other hand, the assignee contends that the bankruptcy proeeedings were commenced prior to the said judgment, and that the judgment is invalid and no lien on the real estate. There is no controversy as to the material facts in the case.

On the 10th day of December, A. D., 1873, Wm. M. Fortescue filed a verified petition in bankruptcy against said Darias Rogers, and thereon the register in bankruptcy issued an order to show cause against said Darias Rogers, returnable on the ——— day of December, A. D., 1873. There were no depositions sustaining the alleged act of bankruptcy, or proof of the creditors claim, offered or filed by the petitioning creditor. The deputy marshal received the order and petition to make service on the debtor, and instead of serving copies, he left the original order at the place of residence of said Rogers, and made no return of service, nor did he serve the debtor with the petition or a copy thereof, and also failed to return the original petition. On the return-day of the order, there being no papers in court and no return of service, nothing further was done; and so the matter rested until the 7th day of January, 1874, when Fortescue filed another petition, and had an order to show cause issued and served on Rogers, with a copy of the petition, and on Januray 15th, that being the return-day, said Rogers was adjudged a bankrupt.

John Hutchings, for petitioner; Z. E. Britton, for the assignee.

FOSTER, J.—The question to be determined in this case is: When were the bankruptcy proceedings commenced within the meaning of the law? The petitioner claims that the proceedings were not commenced until January 7th; and the assignee contends that they were commenced on December 10th. He insists that the depositions, or proofs to the act of bankruptcy, and to the petitioning creditor's claim, need not be filed with the petition, or previous to the issuing of the order to show cause, and that filing the petition and issuing the order of December 10th, was a commencement of bankruptcy proceedings. I do not think that this position can be maintained.

Sec. 38 of the bankrupt act provides: "That the filing of a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy * * * by any creditor against a debtor upon which an order may be issued by the court, * * * shall be deemed and taken to be the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy under this act." It is not the filing of every petition that is deemed a commencement of proceedings, but the filing of a petition upon which an order of adjudication may be made by the court. Can it, in reason, be claimed that a bare petition, unsupported by any proof of the act of bankruptcy, or of the creditor's claim, would be sufficient to base an adjudication of bankruptcy upon? I cannot see that sec. 38 sustains the claim of the respondent, but on the contrary, a fair construction of that section would require the petition to be supported by such proof as would authorize the court to issue an order of bankruptcy, if no appearance was made by the debtor.

Section 10 requires the justices of the supreme court to frame general orders, among other things, "for regulating the practice and procedure of the district courts in bankruptcy, and the several forms of petitions, orders and other proceedings to be used in said court in all matters under this act." The forms prescribed by the supreme court, then, under this section, become an essential part of the law and tend to throw some light upon this question. The order to show cause reads as follows: "Upon filing proofs sustaining the allegations of the petition aforesaid, it is ordered that the said ——— do appear at this court," etc. By this order which is served on him, have been sustained by proofs filed, and he is ordered to appear and show cause why he should not be adjudged a bankrupt.

Again, at the head of forms fifty-five and fifty-six, appear these words: "To be filed with creditor's petition." Upon the return of the order, and on the hearing of the case, it seems from section 41, that the burden of proof rests on the respondent to show that the facts set forth in the petition are not true. This is rather a novel manner of trying an issue at law, and the debtor certainly should have an opportunity to know the case he is called on to meet and the proofs offered in support thereof, and this he is entitled to know without delay, so that he may be prepared with his evidence. In other words, a prima facie case should be made by the proper proofs, before the debtor can legally be required to appear and show cause. In re Leonard, 4 N. B. R., 182. TREAT, J., says: "If there is not proof sufficient to make it appear that the acts of bankruptcy charged have been committed, no order on the defendant to show cause can be granted and the petition falls."

In re Price & Miller, 8 N. B. R., 514, LONGYEAR, J., says: "It must be proved by legal evidence that such grounds existed — in other words, that the facts set forth in the petition are true, before a debtor can be brought into court to show cause against the same, or be in any manner disturbed in his affairs by reason of the filing of the petition." It might be remarked in this connection that there is no record or evidence in this case showing that the court (Judge DELAHAY) authorized the order of December 10th to be issued.

In my opinion these objections go to the jurisdiction of the court, and the proceedings of the 10th of December were illegal, and the order to show cause was void and of no effect, and no bankruptcy proceedings within the meaning of the law were pending prior to January 7th, A. D., 1874. It results that this judgment is a prior lien on the real estate set forth in the petition, and the order of sale must be made as prayed for.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

[Communicated — Second Paper.]

Amendments to the Bankrupt Act — Judge Hopkins' Opinion in Hamlin v. Pettibone — Construction of the Amendments to the 35th and 39th Sections.

In my former article (ante, p. 428) I discussed the decision of Judge HOPKINS in this case, upon the effect of the insertion of the words "knew" and "knowing" in the 35th and 39th sections of the law, instead of "reasonable cause to believe" in the original act, endeavoring to show that the change in the language, by the amendment, wrought a change in the legal effect, and that the opinion upon that point is erroneous. I now propose to examine another question passed upon in this opinion. The point is perhaps best presented by the enquiry, when does the amendment to the 35th section take effect, and upon what cases does it operate?

Judge HOPKINS gives two answers to this enquiry. The first, which I have endeavored to answer, is that it has no operation whatever, being a change of phraseology without any change of sense. The second is, that conceding that the opinion is wrong on the first proposition, still, whatever its operation may be, the amendment can only take effect as to transfers made after the passage, of the amending act. In other words, the act takes effect immediately as to future transactions, but does not operate upon any transfer made prior to the passage of the act. I will endeavor to examine the position of the learned judge upon this point.

The amending act simply provides, in terms, that the 35th section shall be amended by inserting the word "knowing" in the two places designated, and the repealing section provides "that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act (the amending act) are hereby repealed." This amending act, then, took effect and went into operation June 22, 1874, the day of its passage Sedgwick, 83. Hence, it would strike one, at first blush, that from that date the old section 35 gave place to the amended section 35. How could Congress be more explicit? The express language is, "the 35th section be and the same is hereby amended." And then the purport of the repealing clause is, "that part of the 35th section, which is inconsistent with the amended section 35, is repealed, stricken out, and annulled, just as though it never had any existence." If this view be correct then there is no law in existence whereby an assignee can recover in an action founded upon the 35th section, unless the case fall within the 35th section as amended; because there is no original 35th section. It is superseded by the amended section, and it matters not when the transfer took place, when the right of action accrued, or whether the action was brought before or after the passage of the amendment.

But, in order to avoid the force of that which seems to lie upon the face of this amended section, it is sought by construction to make it appear as Interpret the opinion, that the amendment takes effect, as to future cases, immediately; but, as to pending cases, and those arising upon transactions occurring before the passage of the act, the original section is in force, notwithstanding the amendment and the repealing clause: but as to those portions of the act, however, that do not affect existing rights, the same are in force as to all cases, even those pending. But why should we resort to all this artificial complication, and go to the law books for precedents to get a meaning out of plain English, contrary to the one apparent upon the face of it? The answer given is, that the substantial rights of parties may not be changed. But what substantial right is in jeopardy here? The answer is, the right of an assignee to recover back from a party who has received a transfer of property, not dishonestly, but in violation of certain arbitrary provisions of the original act, found in practice to work injustice, and now abandoned for provisions more in consonance with justice and public policy.

Now I submit that the act amended and the amendment under consideration do not belong to the class of statutes in which courts resort to every possible intendment and rule of construction to prevent repeals or amendments from working injury to parties by the destruction or impairing of their rights; but that the original act belongs to the class which being in their nature, in a certain sense penal, mitigating changes by amendments or repeals are not only tolerated, but rather encouraged than discouraged.

The theory adopted by Judge HOPKINS is, 1. That the amendment does not take effect as to pending cases. 2. That the repealing clause follows the amendment, and does not operate except as to those portions to which the latter applies, and therefore does not prevent a prospective construction of the amendment as to such cases. The reasons given for assuming the first proposition are, that any other construction would affect substantial rights, and make that lawful which would otherwise be unlawful. I have already partially answered this part of the argument, and will only add that it is not unusual, by the ordinary plain import of language, for legislators to make that lawful, which was otherwise unlawful, even as to pending cases, and that although substantial rights are affected; and the courts have encouraged such legislation. I need not give a citation of authorities in detail. I cite a few only: Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9, is a leading case upon this point. See also Danville v. Pace, 10 Albany Law Journal, 54, and authorities cited at page 56, embracing text writers and reports from half the states in the Union. It is true the learned judge, in the case under consideration, does not deny this latter proposition, but simply says, the "language must be very clear." But the language here could scarcely be clearer. It is not necessary, where the legislature amend an act by language in the present tense, and then repeal all laws inconsistent with it, to say, "this amendment shall apply to all transfers, whether made before or after the passage of this act." This would be a simple absurdity, because it is the natural, logical, legal effect of what it has already said. But the learned judge argues further, that because the times at which several other of the provisions of the act are to take effect are fixed, some at a period anterior to the passage, and some in advance, therefore Congress did not intend to give the amendment under consideration a retroactive effect. But it is suggested that the fact that such careful attention was paid to other sections and portions of this section, and special provisions made as to the time of their taking effect, is a cogent argument in support of the construction of this amendment and the repealing clause, both without equal qualification, according to their obvious meaning and natural import, in accordance with the well known maxim, "Inclusio unius exclusio alterius."

The principal argument of the learned judge, however, is the well settled rule of law, which forbids a retroactive construction when the act is susceptible of any other. I have already intimated that the rule is not applied to this class of cases with the same rigor as in those cases where the right involved is more meritorius. But while the books are full of cases supporting the general proposition, yet this case comes within an exception to which none of the cases cited by the learned judge apply, and I cannot better illustrate my view here than to quote from the opinion of Mr. Justice COWEN, in Butler v. Palmer, 1 Hill, 327, cited and quoted in Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 152: "A number of cases have been cited by the counsel for the defendant, and some very strong ones, to show that any enactment of the legislature, annulling contracts or creating new exceptions and defences, shall be so construed as not to affect the rights of action existing at the time of the enactment. Cases were also cited to show that a statute in any way modifying the remedy of a party by action, shall never be so construed as to affect actions before the statute. But these are all cases relating to positive enactments; none of them arose upon a repealing clause. The amount of the whole comes to this, that a repealing statute is such an express enactment as necessarily divests all inchoate rights which have arisen under the statute, which it destroys. These rights are but incident to the statute, and fall with it unless saved by express words in the repealing clause." To the same effect is People v. Livingston, 6 Wend. 526. See also Smith's Constitutional Construction, p. 880, sec. 759, p. 881, sec. 761. I might cite any number of authorities to the same effect, but I refer especially to Butler v. Palmer, Leavitt v. Curtis, and Danville v. Pace, supra, for a citation of authorities, and a discussion of the application of the principle of construction of this class of statutes as well as the citation of a great number of authorities.

But it is sought to avoid the effect of this position by first assuming that the amendment does not apply to pending cases, and then insisting that the repealing section only takes effect "when" and "where" the amendment does. But I have endeavored to show that there is no foundation for the major proposition, and if I am right in this, then the minor, which is dependent upon it, must fall with it.

But in addition to this, I submit that if the operation of the amendment upon pending causes were otherwise doubtful, the unconditional repealing section, without a saving clause, is, under the authorities, conclusive of the question, and the result is, either pending cases are governed by the amended section, or there is no law upon which these actions can rest.

For a repeal is not subject to any of the rules of construction laid down in case of positive statutes, but is necessarily retroactive and sweeping, unless a saving clause is introduced. Smith on Constitutional Construction, 887, sec. 765, citing the English cases, and Dwarris on Stats. 676. It is conceded that repeals by implication are not favored, but not by any means that a general repealing section amounts to the same thing. But if both propositions be admitted, how does this affect the question?

The enquiry is not as to what part of the act is repealed, but as to when the repeal takes effect. This being the case, whether such repeals meet with favor or disfavor with the courts, is wholly immaterial. The enactment, including the repealing section, being, as already intimated, in the present tense, without qualification, without saving or reservation, operating simply upon the remedy, or at most upon inchoate rights, and simply mitigating a penal provision of law, must be taken, under all the rules of construction, to have operated eo instanti the passage of the act, and upon all cases arising under the section, whether pending or otherwise.

But first assuming, for reasons already considered, and as I think answered, that the amendment was not intended to operate upon pending cases. Judge HOPKINS cites, Spaulding v. Alford, 1 Pick. 33, and Davis v. Fairbank, 3 How. 363, to the point that the repealing section operates only prospectively. Spaulding v. Alford was an action upon a physician's bill. The statute of 1818 forbade the collection of such a bill unless the physician had obtained a certain certificate. In 1819 another similar act was passed, changing some of the provisions of the act of 1818, as to persons practising medicine after July 1, 1818, and containing a repealing clause of such parts of the former act as were inconsistent, etc. The cause of action was a claim for services rendered after the passage, and before the taking effect of the act of 1819, without the license required by either act; and it was contended that he could recover, but the court held otherwise, deciding that the latter law was not in conflict with the former till the time at which the new provision went into operation. But it is not perceived wherein the position of the learned judge is strengthened by that case. There, the taking effect of the act was expressly postponed till a further day; while here it is not denied that the amendment takes effect, ex vi termini, from its passage. There, if it should have been held that the repealing act took effect instanter, there would have been no law in force upon the subject between the passage of the act and its taking effect; while here it is quite different, the effect of the repeal being only to change the extent of proof required in the given case, and yet it is sought, by mere implication and construction, to suspend the taking effect of the act indefinitely as to certain cases, while as to others it takes effect immediately, notwithstanding the terms of the amendment; and then, by a like construction, to suspend the taking effect of the repealing section, simply to prevent a slight change in the remedy by the amendment made for the express purpose of mitigating an odious provision of law. Nor is there anything in Davis v. Fairbank at all in point; the case simply consisting of a comparison of the provisions of two recording acts, and a decision that the latter act is not in the particular which is the subject of controversy so repugnant to the former, as to repeal it by implication.

It is impossible to close an examination of the books upon the question of interpretation and construction, without feeling that while there is to be found in the utterance of judges and text writers, much of sound wisdom and good sense, here is at the same time much useless refinement, not to say absurdity and nonsense. When a statute is free from constitutional objections, does not infringe inalienable rights, and is free from ambiguity, the only safe rule of construction is the same which applies to all other instruments. The statute should be read and expounded, according to the manifest intention of the legislature, as ascertained by the plain and obvious meaning of the language. This is in accord with the maxims of the sages of the law, which have not been shaken by the experience of ages. Potter's Dwarris on Statutes, 126, citing Vattel's maxims; 17 Johns. 447; 9 Barb. 170; 13 N. Y. R. 80; Potter's Dwaris, 143, et seq., and notes; 16 How. U. S. 251. All efforts, in violation of this rule, to give an artificial construction in such a case by resorting to rules growing out of any consideration of the effect of any given construction, are not only hazardous but uniformly lead to uncertainty and confusion. The only safe way of arriving at a correct construction of the statute in all such cases, is to seek for it by a straight, forward, natural reading of the language, and to apply it to its subject-matter, just as is done with the simplest instrument. Tested by this method of construction, the question under discussion here is simple and easy.

NEW YORK SUPREME COURT REPORTS.—We have received the second and third volumes of the above named reports, and shall notice them at an early day.

THE LAW STUDENT'S REVIEW BOOK. BY DUNLAP & BLIEKENSDERFER. —Address M. E. Dunlap, Erie, Pa. Price $2 50. For sale by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, St. Louis.

This little book must certainly be a hit, at least in a commercial point of view. The reason why we think so, is that some one carried it off, before we found time to write a notice of it. We had, however, examined it with considerable care, and are satisfied that is a good book — that it contains a considerable amount of law condensed in a very small compass, and that properly used, it will prove of much value to law students. We say properly used; for if the student expects to enable himself to pass a creditable examination by studying books of this sort to the exclusion of the elementary treatises of the law, he will probably learn, when it is too late, that although there is a good deal of law in the book, yet there is a good deal more outside of it. But if he will keep it closed until he thinks he is ready, through the study of Blackstone, Kent, Story, Bishop and Greenleaf, to pass an examination, and will then open it for the purpose of reviewing his knowledge and finding out what he don't know, he will put it to profitable use.

EXAMINATION FOR ADMISSION TO THE BAR.—Report of the examination of Law Students for Admission to the bar, in the Supreme Court of Illinois, at the June term, 1874, containing all the questions propounded by the Examiners; the Answers of the Students; Remarks of the Judges; the Final Determination of the Court; together with Rules of Court relating to the Admission of Attorneys. Vol. II. By MYRA BRADWELL. Chicago Legal News Company, 1874.

The first thing that arrests the attention upon opening this book, is the beauty of its typographical execution. With the exception of one or two slight errors of the proof reader, we do not think it can be excelled by the book-making art.

This appears to be the second volume of a series. The first volume contained a report of the examination of the classes of 1873. We are glad Mrs. Bradwell has taken it into her head to publish reports of these examinations. Such publications cannot fail to do much good. They will enable students preparing for such examinations to form some notion of the field of study they are expected to go over. They will also serve to convince them that the examination they must pass is no easy gauntlet to run. This consideration, together with the further fact that their answers, good or bad, will be taken down verbatim and published, will serve to stimulate their diligence, and deter them from presenting themselves before the judges without due preparation. Another effect which the publication of these examinations will have, will be that it will work a benefit to the law schools of Illinois. For, by a rule of the Supreme Court of Illinois, the graduates of any law school organized under the laws of Illinois, whose regular course of law studies is two years, and who require an actual attendance by the student of at least thirty-six weeks in each of such years, is entitled to admission without an examination by the judges. It cannot be doubted, then, that many students will seek admission through the law schools rather than endure the severity of such an examination, and then have their answers, good, bad and indifferent — smart and foolish, "thus set down" in a book.

Another thing which arrests the attention upon opening this book, is that candidates for admittance to the bar of Illinois, other than graduates of law schools, as above stated, and attorneys from other states, under certain restricsuch power appears to be lodged with the judges of the inferior courts. This is as it should be. Experience proves that to vest such jurisdiction in the circuit judges is almost equivalent to throwing down all barriers which it is the policy of the law to preserve, in order to protect the bar from the intrusion of ignorant and incompetent persons. It is well-known that candidates who have feared to submit themselves to the strict examination enforced by the circuit judges of Saint Louis county, have gone out to the country circuits and there got admitted, and have then returned and hung out their shingles in Saint Louis. No discretion is left the Saint Louis judges in such cases, but to enroll the candidate on motion. A stringent law is needed in Missouri, and in some other states, charging the supreme court with the exclusive duty of admitting candidates to the bar; prescribing in general terms the qualifications which should be required of such candidates, and requiring the judges of such court to examine them in open court, but empowering them to call to their aid for this purpose assessors from the qualified members of the bar.

Another thing which will be noticed on running through the pages of this book, is that neither of the classes was examined on admiralty, bankruptcy, or the jurisdiction and practice of the federal courts. Of course there would have been no propriety in judges of a state court examining candidates for admittance to their bar on questions foreign to their jurisdiction. But the lesson deducible from this fact is, that candidates who have passed only an examination of this kind, ought to be again examined before being admitted to practice in the federal courts.

The examination was conducted, in the presence of the court, by attorneys selected for that purpose. It was elementary in its character, but sufficiently horough to satisfy the judges of the qualifications of the candidates. We cannot avoid thinking that too much time was consumed in examining the candidates upon questions exclusively of English law, and which have no application, or very slight application, in this country. For instance, Mr. Denslow consumed considerable time in examining the second class, in asking questions about the jurisdiction of the English courts—a matter which not one American lawyer in fifty understands, and which is of little practical value in this country, and the entire learning in reference to which will become obsolete in England, on the second of November next. We think that more time should have been spent in examining the candidates on the constitution of the United States, and of the state of Illinois. There was too much Blackstone and too little Kent in it; and but one or two questions appear to have been asked touching matters peculiar to the laws of Illinois.

THE MONTHLY WESTERN JURIST. August, 1874. Volume 1, No. 4. Editor and Publisher: THOMAS F. TIPTON, Bloomington, Illinois. Terms, $4 per annum, in advance. Single numbers, 50 cents.

This is a small octavo of 48 pages. It consists chiefly of cases reported in full, many of them with short notes by the editor. The September number contains what appears to be an exhaustive article, on Life Insurance—Insanity —Intemperance—Suicide. We think the name choosen is an unfortunate one. The Western Jurist, published at Des Moines, Iowa, is also a monthly, and we see no reason why Mr. Tipton should have appropriated the name of that publication. The word "Monthly," prefixed to the name of his journal does not constitute a sufficient distinction between the two publications, and much confusion will be the result of it.

Notes and Queries.

SHERMAN, TEXAS, September 4, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I submit the following: The legislature creates counties and declares them municipal corporations, authorizes them to hold lands, points out the mode in which they may be disposed of as follows:

"The county court may, by an order to be endorsed upon the minutes of said court, appoint a commissioner to sell and dispose of any real estate of the county at public auction." This is the only statute in relation to mode.

The county court meet, and in payment of a debt due a creditor of the county, trade him a lot belonging to the county, and direct the commissioner to make him a deed, which is done. The creditor institutes suit against the party in possession, for the land, in an action which authorizes recovery upon either a legal or equitable title. The above facts appear in the petition; defendant demurs.

1. Is the statutory mode mandatory, and do the purchasers take anything under an order of court departing from such mode?

2. Can the order be attacked by defendant in this suit?

3. Can the fact of payment of purchase-money (an antecedent debt) create such an equity as will take the case out of the statute? B.

ANSWER.—If the mode of disposition by public sale is the only mode authorized (which we could not determine without an examination of the entire statute) then it would be mandatory, and in the case put, the purchaser would acquire no title, legal or equitable.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Albany Law Journal, for September 12, has a leader on the Legal Aspects of the Beecher Scandal; a valuable article on the English Law of Negligence in Railroad Companies; a selection from the Law Times on Bazaine and the Franco-English Law of Extradition; its usual abstract of decisions of the New York Court of Appeals, and its usual amount of other interesting notes of decisions, matters of news, etc.

The Canada Law Journal, for September, (Toronto, Willing & Williamson) has an article on a new Digest of Ontario Reports; a curious article on Tenures and Costoms; selects from this journal (ante, p. 304) a review of Mr. Justice Cowen's opinion in the case of the Caroline; adds another handful of pebbles to the pile Criticisms on Text-Writers, Reports and other Legal Authorities; has a selection from the Irish Law Times on Judicial Errors, and another on a Disqiusition on Names, which it curiously credits to the Pittsburg Legal Journal. It also reprints from an early number of this journal, Hooker v. Miller, on the defence of property by Springguns, with a note. See the case and note, ante, p. 55. It also contains a digest of English Law Reports, and other interesting matter.

The American Law Record, for September, continue the article by Dr. Zimmerman in its July number, on The Public Prosecutor System in Germany. It aiso publishes Thorne v. Megrue, Superior Court of Cincinnati, holding that the undertaking of new securities of a trustee, relates back to, and is concurent with, the assumption of the trust. It also publishes (but without a syllabus) Judge Ballard's recent decision in Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Ex. Co., (ante, p. 436).

It also republishes from the Daily Register, People v. Chalmers, Supreme Court of New York (Daniels, J.) the syllabus of which is as follows: "Sureties on a bond given by an assignee under a voluntary assignment, pursuant to chapter 348 of the laws of 1860, are not liable on such bond to judgment creditors of the assignors who have obtained decrees setting aside such assignment as fraudulent; and proof that such decrees were obtained, that the assignee accounted under such decrees, that he was found chargeable in favor of the judgment creditors, with a balance of money representing the value of the assigned property, that he refused or neglected to pay such balance to the judgment creditors, and that the court in wnich the decrees were rendered thereupon ordered his bond to be put in suit, will not sustain a verdict or judgment against the sureties in an action in the name of the people on the bond."

It also republishes from the American Law Times Reports, Heaton v. Fryberger, Supreme Court of Iowa, holding that where the name of a married woman is omitted in the body of a deed, equity cannot supply the omission, even if the execution and acknowledgement are legally sufficient.

It also republishes from the Chicago Legal News, Vallette v. Bennett, and Lewis v. D'Arcy, which we have already noticed.

The Legal Gazette, for September 11, reports City of Nashville v. Ray, Supreme Court of the United States, opinion by Mr. Justice Bradley. Subject, power of municipal corporation to borrow money.

Also Merchants Mutual Ins. Co. v. Baring Brothers & Co., in which the following points are ruled:

1. The court is never required by law to give an instruction to the jury which is not applicable to the case, even though it be correct as an abstract principal or rule of law.

2. Advances made on the credit of a ship for necessary repairs or supplies in a foreign port, create a maritime lien upon the ship, which lien may be enforced by a process in rem,

Also a number of Pennsylvania statutes.

The Chicago Legal News, for September 12, comes to us with eight pages of advertisements, most of it set in solid agate. This is a sign of well-deserved prosperity, which we are glad to see. It publishes an opinion of he Supreme Court of the United States, in Weber v. Board of Harbor Commissioners, on riparian rights, and the authority of a state over the soil under the navigable waters of its harbors.

Also an opinion of Mr. District Judge Longyear, in the Tug Clements, a case where a tug parted from its tow in a storm, expounding the liability of the owner of the tug in such cases.

Also a decision of the Second District Court of Dakota Territory, in Preslo v. Alexander, Shannon, Ch. J. Subject, usury.

Also a decision of the United States Circuit Court, Northern District of Ohio, in Booth v. Parks, Welker, J. Subject, infringement of patent.

Also an opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois (Thornton, J.), in Alvis v. Morrison — a case where the record of an instrument had been destroyed by fire. The court states the effect to be given to such recording and the certificate of record on the original instrument.

In the case of Darias Rogers, published in our last issue, the case was entitled as of the "Eastern District of Kansas." It should have been simply "District of Kansas." The state of Kansas constitutes but one federal district.

INSANITY AS AN EXCUSE FOR CRIME.—The Daily Register, in reviewing the 7th Edition Dr. Wharton's work on Criminal Law, makes the following observations:

To our non-professional readers, the most interesting and profitable portion of the work will doubtless be the volume devoted to "Principles;" and in this connection the well known advice which Blackstone, in his "Commentaries," gives to the gentlemen of England, would well be applicable here. To the "lay gents"—such being the recognized law term in use for hundreds of years to signify the uninitiated—that part of the volume treating of the question of insanity, and the consequent testimony of "experts," will address itself. When we read in trial after trial, no matter what the offense, no matter what the defense, insanity is in some way thrust in, followed by testimony—always conflicting—of experts, we are often tempted to wonder if, after all, "the law is the perfection of reason." Yet it may be said of this, as in so many other instances where law seems one thing and justice another, that the difficulty is not with the law, but in its application. The course now followed in mixing up the issue of insanity with the other questions in the case to be passed upon by the same jury, at the same time by the same verdict, though sanctioned by time honored custom, is attacked from all quarters with loud complaints. Many schemes have been proposed. The Albany Law Journal, an able and leading law periodical, always alive to the issues of the day, in recent numbers has suggestions that a portion of the jury be composed of medical men, that one or two doctors sit at a trial as quasi judges, who shall charge the jury on questions of insanity in like manner as the judge charges them upon questions of law; that the question of insanity shall be left wholly to a few doctors, whose decision shall be final.

In the Ohio Legislature a bill was recently pending, if it has not already been disposed of, which provides that in cases where the defendant expects to plead insanity, he must give notice thereof beforehand; an issue upon that point alone is then to be made up, and the fact of insane or not to be tried and decided by a special jury in advance of his trial upon the indictment. Whether or not any of these schemes would materially advance the interests of justice, time only would prove; but that some change is needed is evident. We might add that perhaps the root of the evil lays deeper than the mere application of the law. Is it certain that insanity should be a defense against punishment for acts which are admitted would be criminal in a sane person? If the laws of society stand only upon the foundation of mutual protection — and with the immorality of crime human laws have nothing to do — should not society be protected? This question, however, opens up a discussion much too important for the limited space of a book notice. Dr. Wharton's work treats of the law as it is, not of changes which might be introduced.

Judicial Dignity.

Some of our foreign legal exchanges seem to have enjoyed very much a picture of a criminal trial in one of the courts of common pleas of Ohio, drawn by a correspondent of our excellent contemporary, the Canada Law Journal. We confess that this correspondent holds the mirror up to nature so closely that we cannot doubt that his statements are, in the main, truthful; but our knowledge of the people of Ohio, of their wealth and culture, induces the suspicion that his lively imagination, may have drawn him unconsciously into the fault of adding a few extra touches, just to enhance the tout ensemble, you know. However this may be, since the Tichborne trial, we feel reconciled to almost anything our Canadian and British brethren may say of our courts and judges. The gowns and the wigs may have given that great trial an appearance of dignity, but it was at many times the shadow without the substance. Let him who is fond of comparisons imagine (if he can) the Chief Justice of the United States, with one of his associates on either hand, bandying words with an advocate, as the Lord Chief Justice of England bandied words with Dr. KENEALY. When we consider how our Canadian and British friends must have enjoyed themselves in reading this pen-picture of the Ohio court, we derive additional consolation from the thought that the entire bar of Montreal felt obliged during four months of the past winter to withdraw from practice before the highest court of that province. We also derive a few crumbs of comfort from the following picture, which we find in the Irish Law Times, of the dignified behavior of an English county judge, whose jurisdiction appears to resemble, in some respects, that of the judges of the common pleas of Ohio:

County court judges in England sometimes curiously forget their position, as will appear by the following extraordinary scene which occurred at the petty sessions lately held at Rhyl, and arose out of a charge of assault, prefered by a hackney car-driver named Powell, against Mr. Robert Vaughan Williams, who holds the appointment of county court judge of the district, which includes Chester and most of the towns of North Wales. It appeared that on Friday last the complainant was driving a vehicle which came into collison with the defendant's carriage in one of the streets of Rhyl. Defendant then struck Powell with his whip, and this was the assault complained of. When the case was called on, the defendant rose, and delivered an angry address, which he concluded by ordering the plaintiff into custody for a period of seven days. This seemed rather too much for the magistrate who presided, and the chairman (Mr. Dixon) said the case must be taken in the ordinary way. In the meantime, a solicitor made an observation which still further aggravated the county court judge, who forthwith threatened him with seven days' incarceration. Nevertheless, the case was proceeded with, and the upshot was that the bench ordered the judge to pay a fine of £5, which his honor indignantly declined to do, whereupon the bench gave him the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment. This terrible punishment was, however, averted by the kind offices of a friend, who paid the fine.

But to return to the letter of the Canada correspondent. After describing the court-room and the jurors, he says:

This case (it was the trial of a citizen for burglary) had been going on all day before; counsel had already "made augument" three different times; the prisoner's counsel was just winding up an address, the magnitude of which was obvious from the pile of manuscript in which it was transcribed, and to which constant reference was made, and it was stated that the state prosecutor and judge would follow at proportionate length. The long suffering of the jurors was, however, made intelligible when we were told they were professionals—in other words, that they made a business of serving on juries, and thereby earned a competent livelihood. It was also darkly hinted that a suitor had facilities for retaining a jury, as well as a counsel—and a judge. There was a judicial bench in the court of common pleas, but at present it was unoccupied. An elderly gentleman was sitting on a cane-bottomed chair, facing the wrong way, and warming his back at the open fire. His chin was resting on the chair-back, and he was meditating profoundly. He occasionally rose, traversed the room, his hands in his pockets, and expectorated thoughtfully. This was the judge. The prisoner sat by his counsel at a small table in front of the jury. We looked in vain for a dock. They have more delicacy about those matters in the states. There was another gentleman at this counsel's table, who attracted observation. His chair was tilted back against a pillar; his feet rested on the back of another chair before him. He was so placed that the judge was seated directly opposite him, and was forced to contemplate the soles of his boots. This gentleman was dressed in the seediest apparel; he picked his teeth with a pen-knife; he expectorated continuously; he was lean and sallow.

We thought he might be a crier of the court, or a personal friend of the burglar. What was our surprise when, on the defendant's counsel drawing his tedious oration to a close, he lowered his feet from their elevation, brought his chair to the horizontal, and rose with the obvious intention of haranguing the jury. He was, in truth, the state prosecutor. He first took from the table a dirk, which, with other murderous articles, had been found upon the prisoner. He examined it deliberately, felt its edge, held it up for the jury to observe, and commenced his address with the calmness and self-possession of the practical speaker. The opening of his speech was almost word for word as follows:—"You have heard tell, gentlemen of the jury, of the Gordian knot. Alexander, gentlemen, Alexander the Great, wanted to untie that Gordian knot, but he could not do it, nohow. So what did he do? He just whipped out his sword and cut that knot right square through. Now, gentlemen, we have a Gordian knot to untie, and a tough one, too. But I won't trouble you to untie it. I'll just slither it right clean through with this dagger. You have likely seen instruments of this sort before. They are only found on two classes of men—Texan Rangers and Italians; and when you find one of these on a man, you know he's a rascal and a scoundrel, like this fellow here."

At this juncture, the learned correspondent was seized with a disposition to mirth, which, he says, attracted the attention of the usher of the court, who was "eating an apple with a pocket-knife, which had evidently cut a good deal of tobacco," and he thought it well to retire before he had compromised his character by laughing in the face of justice.

The Emperor JULIAN, was, we must allow (although we cannot agree with him in his religious views), a judge of no mean pretentions. He frequently presided in the Forum of Constantinople, clad in his imperial garments; and his clear and penetrating intellect constantly detected and exposed the shams and the subtleties of the advocates. But his indignation against the pettifogger frequently overcame his dignity, and for this fault, he often suffered himself to be reproved by his ministers. But, great as he was as a judge, as a warrior, as a statesman, and as the supreme pontiff of the Immortal Gods, to say nothing of his skill as an orator and his wisdom as a philosopher, we are pained to say that he was not ashamed to boast that his hands were never washed, and that his beard was unkempt and populous. We have judges of high courts in the United States who expectorate tobacco juice from the judgment seat, and who write two-bottle and three-bottle opinions that would not have disgraced my Lord ELDON. We sincerely wish, for the sake of history, that Judge JULIAN could have been induced to wash his hands and comb his beard; and we sincerely wish that all American judges would refrain from the use of tobacco while on the bench, and from the use of ardent spirits at all times. We also hope that all judges will digest their dinner and "sleep well o' nights," to the end that they may be able to treat the members of the bar, and particularly the younger members thereof, with that indulgence which is due to the dignity of the court and to the infirmity of the advocate. In short, we desire to record our vote in favor of judicial dignity.

The Louisiana Question.

Since going to press with our last issue, the acting government of the state of Louisiana has been overthrown by an armed insurrection, and re-instated by the President of the United States. With the exception of the Arkansas case, this is the first time in our history when it has been sought to overturn a de facto state government on the Spanish-American plan. So anamolous is the case, and so strong are the political feelings entering into it, that in attempting to discuss it, men are apt to lose their heads. On the one hand the spectacle of an established state government being overthrown in a few hours by an insurrection rising up in the streets of the state capital, is calculated to produce a profound feeling of alarm in the breast of every friend of republican institutions. On the other hand, it is not for Americans to deny a prniciple which is incorporated into many of our state constitutions, that the doctrine of non-resistance to arbitrary power is a slavish doctrine, unworthy of a free people, and that, whatever the form of government or condition of society, the right of revolution always remains, subject to be called into exercise by grievances which have become intolerable and which can be redressed in no other mode.

It is not our purpose to discuss any political question involved in the Louisiana troubles. The province of a law journal is to eschew politics and to address itself to legal questions alone. We therefore remain silent on what may be termed the merits of the case. We neither condemn nor defend the recent insurrection in the streets of New Orleans; but we propose to direct attention to the simple point of the legality of the President's action in the premises.

The constitution of the United States (Art. 4, § 4) provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every state in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence." The act of February 28, 1795, §1 (1 Stat. 424) provides that "in case of an insurrection in any state against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United states, on application of the legislature of such state, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) to call forth such number of militia of any other state or states, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection." There may be other acts of Congress of a similar import, but a consideration of the above (which dates back to an early period in the history of the republic) makes it clear that it is the duty of rhe President when applied to by the duly consituted governor of a state (when the legislature cannot be convened) to protect such state government against insurrectionary overthrow. It must be also obvious that the President is the final judge whether the exigency contemplated by the statute has arisen. See Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. 19.

If, therefore, the state government of Missouri or of Illinois, or any other state government concerning the lawful existence of which there is no dispute, were attacked by a domestic insurrection, no doubt could arise as to the President's duty in the premises. But the difficulty in the Arkansas and Louisiana cases arose from the fact that in each case there were two governments, each claiming to be the duly elected and legally constituted government of the state. Between these two contending parties, the duty laid upon the president by the constitution and laws, obliged him finally to decide. But whilst this obligation rested upon him, he was not a judicial officer, and obviously had no jurisdiction to hear and determine a case of a contested election for the office of governor of a state; nor had he any superintending jurisdiction which would enable him to revise the judgment of the state tribunal whose jurisdiction it was to hear and determine the question. His duty was obviously limited to supporting that party who had been declared elected by the tribunal having jurisdiction to make such declaration. In the Arkansas case, when the President became satisfied that the legislature was the tribunal having exclusive and final jurisdiction over the question, and that it had decided the question in favor of Baxter, who had been duly declared elected and installed in the office according to the forms of law, it became his imperative duty to support Baxter against insurrectionary overthrow, although he may have believed, as most well informed persons did believe, that Brooks had been elected by a clear majority. He could not constitute himself or any of his legal advisers a judge for the purpose of investigating the merits of the case; he could not go behind the decision of the tribunal which had authority to count the votes and declare the result, but to the decision of that tribunal he was obliged to give full faith and credit.

We suggest, therefore, that it is by this standard that the legality of the President's action in the Louisiana case must be judged. If the Kellogg government was declared elected by the state tribunal having jurisdiction to count the votes and declare the result (for no one pretends that Judge DURELL'S celebrated order was anything more than a mere nullity) it was the duty of the President to protect his government against insurrectionary overthrow. But on the other hand, if Kellogg was not declared elected by this tribunal, or by the duly constituted tribunal having jurisdiction finally to hear and determine the contest, then he was a mere usurper; and any movement, insurrectionary or otherwise, which resulted in establishing the duly elected state government in power, called for no interference on the part of the general government. We are not sufficiently acquainted with the history of the Louisiana case to express any opinion on these questions.

The Railway Question in Wisconsin—The Potter Law—Injunction to Compel Observance.

The constitution of Wisconsin (Art. 11, sec. 1) provides that corporations may be created by general laws or special acts, and then declares: "All general laws or special acts enacted under the provisions of this section may be altered or repealed by the legislature at any time after their passage." Under these provisions the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Wisconsin (present Mr. Justice DAVIS of the United States Supreme Court and DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge), some weeks since, sustained the validity of what is known as the Potter law, regulating railway tariffs in that state (ante, p. 348). Soon after that decision was pronounced, the attorney-general of the state of Wisconsin, ex officio, filed an information in the nature of an injunction bill in equity, originally in the supreme court of the state, the object of which was to compel the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway corporation to conform to the Potter law, and to that end a preliminary injunction was moved by the attorney-general before the full bench. The motion was resisted by the the company, upon two main grounds: 1st. Because the supreme court of the state had no original jurisdiction to issue the writ of injunction. 2d. On the merits, because the Potter law is unconstitutional. On the 15th instant, the supreme court announced its decision overruling these objections, and awarding the writ as asked by the attorney-general.

The following is the provision of the state constitution in relation to the issue of writs by the supreme court, and which it was held did not preclude the remedy sought by the attorney-general on behalf of the state: "The supreme court shall have power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari and other original and remedial writs, and to hear and determine the same." Art. 7, sec. 3. The same section provides that "the supreme court, except as otherwise provided in this constitution, shall have appellate jurisdiction only."

The subjoined abstract of the decision of the supreme court granting the temporary injunction, is said to have been prepared by Chief Justice RYAN, of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, and it bears upon its face such evidence of substantial correctness that we feel justified in presenting it to our readers:

This court has no original jurisdiction of proceedings by injunction at the suit of private persons, or to enforce private remedies, but has jurisdiction of the writ, in matters public, upon information of the attorney-general, in the nature of an injunction bill, to restrain excess where mandamus would not go to remedy the defect. The writ given to this court in a group of prerogative writs is given as a quasi prerogative writ for prerogative purposes. Considered and approved independently of secs. 13 and 14, chap. 148, Revised Statutes, courts of equity have jurisdiction, upon information of the attorney-general, ex-officio, to restrain corporations from excess or abuse of corporate franchises, or other violation of public law under color of franchise to the public injury. These sections confer no jurisdiction on this court. Whether they operate to limit the jurisdiction of the circuit courts is not here considered. It is for the court to determine, on such an information, whether the acts charged work a public injury. This jurisdiction was an established equitable jurisdiction at the time of the adoption of the state constitution, and sec. 5, art. 1, of the constitution, in relation to trial by jury, has no application to it. Were this otherwise, the questions raised by these informations are questions of law, and the jurisdiction of them in equity deprives the defendants of no right of trial by jury. Chap. 273, of 1874, is not repealed by chaps. 292 or 341 of the same session. All the chapters can and will stand together. The court finds no difficulty in holding that the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company is the corporation designated as the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company in chap. 273. The corporation is sufficiently indicated by the name used in the statute, although it had a month before added the prefix of "Chicago" to its name. The constitutional amendment of 1871 prohibiting special acts of the legislature for granting corporate power or privileges except to cities is prospective only, and has no relation to existing corporate charters by special acts before the amendment. These may be amended or repealed by special act, as before. The rule established in the Dartmouth College case, is considered and disapproved as far as it is extended to quasi private corporations instrusted by charter with public interests so as to constitute them quasi public corporations. The rule is followed, nevertheless, by the court, because it is the rule of the Supreme Court of the United States of the construction of a clause in the federal constitution; but the reserved power in the state constitution to alter or repeal corporate charters, was designed to take, and does take, all corporations created under it out of the rule in the Dartmouth College case, and the legislature has the same power over such corporations as if the rule in that case had never existed. The reserved power to alter or repeal has no other limit in law than is implied in the words used; the power to alter or a power to amend a charter without entirely changing its purpose or character. The exercise of the power should be under the guidance of extreme moderation and discretion, and should not be oppressive and unreasonable. But all this rests in the legislative discretion. So far as corporate franchises are concerned, the legislature is under a moral obligation not to reduce the tolls of railroads below a fair and adequate amount, but their power over the franchise is absolute. But the power to alter or repeal cannot affect the property of corporations other than the franchise. Such right of property is inviolable.

It is not material here whether the defendants had elected to accept or reject the alteration of their charters. By chap. 273 they were bound to obey the statute, or to discontinue their operations as corporate bodies. In either case, they had no right to conduct their operations in defiance of public law. Chap. 273, of 1874, so far as its provisions are before the court in the cases, is a valid amendment of special charters of the defendants, granted by the state. Whether it would be a valid amendment of the general railroad act of 1872 is not here considered. The territorial charter of 1847 of the Milwaukee & Waukesha Railroad Company, extended by the territorial act of 1848, is the subsisting charter of the railway built under it from Milwaukee to Prairie du Chien. It does not appear in this case whether the charter was accepted and the corporation organized under it before the adoption of the state constitution. There is a presumption in the circumstances that they were. Such being the case, the charter is not subject to the reserved power to alter or repeal; and, as chap. 273 of 1874 would impair the obligation of a franchise of that charter within the rule in the Dartmouth College case, chap. 273 of 1874 cannot be held to apply to the railroad built and existing under that charter if accepted before the adoption of the state constitution.

An information in equity by the attorney-general, ex-officio, has the same effect as to answer and injunction as a bill in chancery verified on information and belief. Now, the question is unimportant, because the violation of chap. 273 charged is apparent from the affidavits on both sides. There is a judicial discretion to withhold an injunction and mandamus in aid of private remedies, but there is no such discretion at the suit of the state in matters of public injuries. In such cases writs go peremptorily, ex debito justiciæ. The court has discretion to withhold either of the writs in cases of positive public injury. The motions of the attorney-general must be granted, and the writs issue as to all the roads of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company, and all of the roads of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company except the railroad from Milwaukee to Prarie du Chien, built under the territorial charter of 1847 and 1848; but before the writs issue the attorney-general must file in these causes his official stipulation not to prosecute the defendants for forfeiture of their charters for any violations of chap. 273, charged in these informations, before the 1st day of October next, that time being allowed by the court to the defendants to arrange their rates of toll under chap. 273.

This decision fortifies the presumption of the correctness of the judgment of the United States Circuit Court, that under the constitution of Wisconsin, the legislature has quite unlimited control over the railroads of the state. Mr. Senator CARPENTER, one of the ablest lawyers of the country, made an elaborate and forcible argument at Ripon, Wisconsin, on the 16th instant, asserting the same doctrine, to which we shall refer more at length hereafter.

A mandatory injunction to compel compliance with a public law is a feature in the case that will not fail to attract the attention of the profession.

Mr. Justice Curtis.

A great man is but a nine days' wonder. When the telegraph announced, in the midst of ths excitement occasioned by the Louisiana troubles, that a great jurist had died quietly in his bed, very few took notice of it, and some of those who did, no doubt asked themselves, "who is Judge CURTIS?".

BENJAMIN ROBBINS CURTIS, was born at Watertown, Mass., November 4, 1809. He graduated at Harvard College, in 1829, was admitted to the bar in 1832, and commenced the practice of law at Northfield, Mass. Soon after he removed to Boston, whose bar numbered in its lists the great names of WEBSTER and CHOATE, MASON and DEXTER. Here his commanding talents brought him into such high repute that in September, 1851, at the early age of forty-one, he succeeded, in obedience to the general desire of the whig party of Massachusetts, to the seat on the Supreme Bench of the United States, made vacant by the death of Mr. Justice WOODBURY.

It is a singular coincidence, that on the happening of Mr. Justice WOODBURY's death, Mr. WEBSTER being in Boston and President FILLMORE at the national capital, each without understanding the other's wishes, singled out Mr. CURTIS as the appropriate recipient of this high honor. On the 10th of September, 1851, Mr. WEBSTER wrote to Mr. FILLMORE, as follows:

A very important vacancy is created by Judge WOODBURY'S death. The general, perhaps I may say, the almost universal sentiment here is, that the place should be filled by the appointment of Mr. B. R. CURTIS. Mr. CHOATE is perhaps Mr. CURTIS' leader, and is more extensively known, as he has been quite distinguished in public life. But it is supposed he would not accept the place. He must be conferred with, and I should have seen him to-day, but he is out of town. I shall see him as soon as possible. Every thing being put at rest in that quarter, as I presume it will be the moment I see Mr. CHOATE, I recommend the immediate appointment of Mr. CURTIS. There will be an advantage in disposing of the matter as soon as may be. Judge SPRAGUE is now on his way home from Europe. His friends, no doubt, will urge his pretensions. Judge PITMAN, too, of the District of Rhode Island, is a learned lawyer, an able judge and an excellent man. If an appointment were to be made by promotion from the bench of a district court, it would be very difficult to overlook Judge PITMAN, who has been on the bench more years, by a good many, than Judge SPRAGUE, and working at a much smaller sallary. But in my judgment it is decidedly better to appoint a man much younger than either of these judges. Mr. B. R. CURTIS is of a very suitable age, forty-one; he has good health excellent habits, sufficient industry and love of labor, and, I need hardly add, is in point of legal attainment and general character, in every way fit for the place.

On the same day Mr. FILLMORE wrote to Mr. WEBSTER, with reference to this subject, as follows:

"I believe that Judge MCLEAN is the only whig upon the bench, and he received his appointment from General JACKSON. I am therefore desirous of obtaining as long a lease, and as much moral and political support as possible, from this appointment. I would, therefore, like to combine a vigorous constitution with high moral and intellectual qualifications — a good judicial mind and such age as gives a prospect of long service. Several distinguished names have occurred to me, but I do not consider myself so intimately acquainted with the New England bar as to be able to form a correct opinion. I have, however, formed a very high opinion of Mr. B. R. CURTIS. What do you say of him? * * Does he fill the measure of my wishes?

Two days later, Mr. FILLMORE wrote to Mr. WEBSTER in reply to the letter first above quoted, "I am happy to see that we both concur in opinion as to Mr. B. R. CURTIS. I will wait till you can see Mr. CHOATE, and if all is satisfactory, I will issue the commission at once." Soon after, Mr. FILLMORE having learned that Mr. CHOATE concurred in the general desire that Mr. CURTIS should receive the appointment, issued the commission to him.

The "moral and judicial power," as Mr. FILLMORE expressed it, of the two whig members of the bench, Mr. Justice MCLEAN and Mr. Justice CURTIS was shown in their dissenting opinions in the memorable Dred Scott case, 19 Howard, 529–633. Mr. Justice CURTIS' opinion alone covered ninety pages of closely printed matter. His disagreement with the majority of the court on the great questions involved in that case, is supposed to have been one of the causes which induced his resignation, which took place a year latter, in the fall of 1857. On retiring from the bench, he returned to Boston and resumed an extensive practice at the bar, in which he continued, until the sickness which resulted in his death. During this period he served two years in the legislature of his state. Notwithstanding what might be inferred from his dissenting opinion in the Dred Scott case, he was, during the latter years of his life, a democrat in politics, and his name was frequently mentioned as the possible candidate of that party for the presidency. On the death of Mr. SUMNER, he was the candidate of his party for the seat in the United States senate thus made vacant; and during the whole of that protracted contest, their vote was cast solidly for him.

The published works of Mr. Justice CURTIS would have given his name a place in the memory of the legal profession, if he had never acquired any fame as a jurist. While on the bench he found time to edit two volumes of circuit court reports, the former of which was published in 1854, the latter in 1857. These volumes comprise the most valuable part of his labors while presiding justice of the first circuit. But his wonderful diligence and capacity for labor are shown in the fact that he found time in the midst of the arduous duties of his judicial position to edit in a greatly abridged form, and with head-notes entirely re-written, fifty-eight volumes of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the Unired States. These he compressed into twenty-one volumes and added a digest, the whole being completed before his retirement from the bench. The value of this edition is greatly enhanced by the fact that each case is followed by references to kindred decisions. A continuation of it is now being edited by Mr. Justice MILLER.

One of the great acts of the concluding portion of Mr. Justice CURTIS' life was his participation in the trial of the impeachment of President JOHNSON. He delivered the opening speech in defence of Mr. JOHNSON — an effort which fully sustained his great reputation. One of the last acts of his professional life was an opinion in which he held the "Potter" Wisconsin railroad law to be in derogation of the constitution of the United States and void. A contrary view of the question has been taken by a federal circuit court, composed of Mr. Justice DAVIS and Mr. Circuit Judge DRUMMOND, and this view is now fortified by the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in an opinion of great length, a synopsis of which we publish elsewhere. But the question remains to by passed upon by that court whose judgment can alone decisively and authoritatively settle it.

Judge CURTIS was what may be termed a working, rather than a jury lawyer. He could not employ in the contests of the bar the commanding eloquence of Mr. WEBSTER, nor did he possess anything akin to the subtle and almost universal genius of Mr. CHOATE. But his logic was of a broad and masterly character, and his intellect was vigorous and penetrating. Add to this the almost superhuman capacity for labor which he possessed when in good health, and we have the key to the secret of his great success. He doubtless left behind a few who may claim equal eminence with him at the American bar, but they can almost be counted on the fingers of one's hand.

Master and Servant — Negligence of Captain of Merchant Ship — Injury to Sailor on Board — Liability of Owner of Vessel.

Irish Court of Common Pleas, June 11th and 29th, 1874.

Before MONAHAN, Ch. J., and MORRIS, J.

1. The General Rule in such Cases.—To render an employer liable for injury to one in his employ, through the negligence of another person also in his employ, it must be shown that the latter was not merely a fellow-workman, but was placed in a position of such authority as fairly to represent the employer himself.

2. Exception—Captain and Seaman.—The captain of a merchant-ship under his control and management is not a mere fellow workman of the seamen on board, bound to obey him, but is such an agent or representative of the owner of the vessel, that the latter, by whom he has been appointed, will be liable for an injury to a seaman, sustained by him through the captain's negligence during the voyage, while the seaman is acting in obedience to an order given by the captain.

Demurrer.—The first count of the summons and plaint was as follows: "For that, at the time of the committing of the grievances hereinafter mentioned, the defendants were possessed of a certain ship called "The Vespa," then being navigated by their servants under the sole control and management of one William M'Cullagh, who was captain of said ship, appointed in that behalf by the defendants, and as such captain governed and directed the said ship and the seamen and servants thereof, and whose orders as such captain the said seamen and servants were bound to obey. And one John Ramsey, for certain hire and reward therefor to be payed to him, agreed with the defendants to serve and do the work and duties of an able-bodied seaman on board the said ship, under the control and orders of the said captain, during a certain voyage from Troon to Belfast, and the said John Ramsey thereupon entered on board the said ship as such seaman upon the terms aforesaid, and the plaintiff says that, whilst said ship was on said voyage and the said William M'Cullagh was captain of said ship as aforesaid, the defendants' said captain negligently, unskilfully, and improperly ordered the said John Ramsay and the other seamen on board the said ship to abandon said ship, and the said John Ramsey and the other seamen did, in obedience to the said orders, and as they were bound to do, then proceed to abandon the said ship, by reason whereof the said John Ramsey, whilst he was in the act of so abandoning said ship, in obedience to and in execution of said order so unskilfully and improperly given as aforesaid by the defendants' said captain, was drowned, and within twelve calendar months next before this suit, lost his life."

Demurrer, on the grounds that the above count disclosed no personal negligence on the part of the defendants; that the captain and John Ramsay were fellow-servants, and that the only negligence averred was that of the captain; that the count did not state, or show any obligation on Ramsay to obey the order; that the facts alleged disclosed no obligation on the defendants; that, if the order were unlawful, Ramsay was not bound to obey it, and if lawful the defendants were not liable.

Boyd, in support of the demurrer. The defendants are not liable unless they have been guilty of negligence in the selection of the captain of the vessel, and yet no such negligent selection is averred. When one fellow-servant has been injured by another fellow-servant, the master is not liable, unless he has been guilty of negligence in selecting an unskilful or incapable servant in the person who has done the injury. Tarrant v. Webb, 25 L. J. C. P. 261; Wilson v. Merry and Another, L. R. 1 Sc. App. 327; Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, 3 Macq. H. L. 282. The captain of a vessel and a seaman, notwithstanding the difference of their social positions and the nature of their employment, are fellow-servants. Tarrant v. Webb. Again, the plaint alleges that the captain "negligently, unskilfully, and improperly ordered" the deceased to abandon the the ship, and that while acting "in obedience to said order," and as he was "bound to do," he was drowned. Now, if this order were such as described, the deceased was not bound to obey it, and if the order was a proper one, and in obeying it the deceased lost his life, the defendants were not liable.

M'Mahon, Q. C. (with him Frazer), contra. The captain of the vessel is the agent of the defendants, and for an act negligently done by him resulting in the death of the deceased, they are liable. He is not a mere fellow-servant of each member of his crew. In Story on Agency (7th Ed. p. 124-128), the peculiar official position of the captain of a vessel is defined. He can hypothecate the ship; he is treated not as an ordinary agent, but as a special employer or the owner of the ship; he unites in himself the double powers of the absolute and temporary owner or charterer of the ship; the law treats him as having a special property in, and charge of the ship. The master of the ship is the person entrusted with the care and management of it, and the employers or owners of a ship are responsible for the contracts of their captains, while they are not responsible for the contracts of their mariners, because these latter are not appointed for the purpose of conducting the business of the ship, but only for laboring in its navigation under the orders of the master. Abbott, Shipping Laws, 11th ed. 93, 101-2. If a captain of a vessel be guilty of any default of duty, his employers are responsible for his acts in those things that respect his duty under them, though they are not answerable for his conduct in those things which do not respect his duty to them, e.g., if he commit an assault on the voyage. Ellis v. Turner, 8 T. R. 531. Again, the mariner is bound to obey every lawful order of his captain. Once the voyage commences, it is his duty to navigate the ship at all perils. No matter what danger he may incur, he is entitled to no special remuneration, because he simply performs his duty. Abbott, Shipping Law, 153. Even when an order to abandon the ship has been given bona fide to the crew, although the danger did not justify such an order, yet the crew is justified, and therefore bound to leave her. "The Florence," 16 Jur. 573.

Boyd, in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

MORRIS, J.—The defendants have demurred in this case to the first count of the summons and plaint. The widow of a seaman named John Ramsey, has brought this action against the owners of a vessel called "The Vespa," to recover damages for the death of her hushand. The count which has been demurred to, states that the ship was under the sole control of one William M'Cullagh, who was the captain of the ship, and appointed to that post by the defendants, that acting in that capacity he governed the ship and the crew, and that the crew were bound to obey all orders given by him, as captain. It then states that the deceased, Ramsey, entered into the defendants' service as an able-bodied seaman, and that as such he went on board "The Vespa," commanded by said William M'Cullagh. It next states that the deceased started on a voyage, and that during that voyage the captain negligently, unskilfully and improperly ordered the said Ramsey and other seamen to abandon the ship, and that in obedience to such order, and as they were bound, the deceased Ramsey and the rest of the crew proceeded to abandon the ship, and in the execution of the order Ramsey lost his life. The demurrer is taken on the ground that no action will lie against the owners of the ship, upon the authority of a great number of authorities, commencing with Priestly v. Fowler, 3 M. & W., and culminating with Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1 Sc. App. 326. All these cases establish that no action will lie against an employer for injuries to one fellow-servant through the negligence or want of skill of another fellow-servant, no matter in what capacity he may be, provided both are the servants of the same person. The distinction between the ordinary case of fellow-workmen and that where one of the parties employed occupies a position superior to that of the other—being, for example, a foreman or superintendent—appears to have been removed by Wilson v. Merry. But in that case I find nothing repugnant to the principles laid down in Murphy v. Smith, 19 C. B. N. S. 361, that when an employer has an agent or representative, held to be so by the jury, and who is not merely a fellow-workmen of the party sustaining the injury, the employer is liable for an injury to his servants, occasioned by the neglect or unskilfuness of his agent or representative.*

Now, in what class are we to place the captain or master of the vessel in this case? Is he merely the fellow-servant of the deceased, or the agent and representative of the defendants? In my opinion he comes within the latter class. He is the agent and representative of the owners during the voyage. His position is thus defined in the best books on this subject. So he has authority to bind the owners for repairs and necessaries, and it is within his competence to settle claims for demurrage.

That being so, and coupled with the statements in the summons and plaint, that the ship was under the control and management of the captain, that he was appointed by defendants, that he governed and directed the ship, and that the seamen on board were bound to obey his orders, we consider that, the liability of the defendants depending on the question whether the captain was the agent or representative, that question cannot be decided in their favor on demurrer to the count. The demurrer must be overuled. Any other question the defendants wish to raise must be raised by a plea to the count.

MONAHAN, C.J.—I quite concur with my brother Morris in the judgment he has given. But I would prefer to rest my opinion on the averments in the summons and plaint as to the authority delegated by the defendants to the captain, all which averments the demurrer admits. Resting my opinion on those averments, the demurrer must be overruled.

DEMURRER DISALLOWED.

Alienation of Homestead by Husband Without Consent of Wife—Remedy of Wife.

PARALEE WILLIAMS, BY NEXT FRIEND, v. J. B. WILLIAMS, et al.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, April Term, 1874.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY,
" ROBERT MCFARLAND,
" JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
" THOS. J. FREEMAN,
" JOHN L. T. SNEED,

Alienation of Homestead without Consent of Wife—Wife's Remedy—Bill quia Timet.—Under the constitution and laws of Tennessee, a conveyance of the homestead property by the husband, without the wife joining in the conveyance, is absolutely void; but such a conveyance, nevertheless, so far endangers the rights of the wife, that she may maintain a bill in equity to remove the cloud from her title, and have her homestead rights declared.

Mr. Chief Justice NICHOLSON delivered the opinion of the court.

J. B. Williams, being the owner in fee of a small tract of land in Henderson county, which, with the improvements thereon, was worth less than $1,000, on the 28th of December, 1872, sold and conveyed the same to John M. Meals, and executed to him a deed in fee simple, with covenants of seizin and general warranty. In this conveyance, complainant Paralee, who is the wife of said J. B. Williams, did not join. By her next friend she files her bill, alleging these facts, and also that this tract of land is all the real property owned by her husband or herself, and that at the time of the conveyance, her husband and herself were in the actual possession of the land as their homestead, and that they still continue in possession thereof, but that the deed so made by her husband, without her joining therein, constitutes a cloud upon her rights under the homestead law, and she prays that the cloud be removed, and her rights declared and protected. The bill was filed against J. B. Williams and J. M. Meals, as to both of whom the bill was taken for confessed.

Upon the hearing, Chancellor NIXON dismissed the bill, and complainant has appealed.

The constitution secures a homestead, in the possession of each head of a family, and the improvements thereon, to the value, in all, of one thousand dollars, and exempts the same from sale under legal process, during the life of such head of a family. The plain intention of this provision is, not merely to protect the husband, or the head of the family, in the possession and enjoyment of the homestead, but the protection of the interests of the wife and the minor children, constituted a leading consideration for the adoption of the provision. This fact is apparent, by the prohibition against the alienation of the property without the joint consent of husband and wife, when that relation exists. To give complete protection to the wife and children, the homestead is not only exempt from the reach of creditors of the husband, but he is deprived of the power to defeat the enjoyment of the homestead by his wife and children, by selling and conveying it, except by deed in which she joins. And the legislature in giving legislative effect to these provisions, requires that the conveyance shall be regulated by the laws as to the conveyance of land by married women; that is, the conveyance can be effective only upon the privy examination of the wife. Code, sec. 2114 a.

It is manifest from these constitutional and legislative provisions, that while possession of the homestead is the essential feature in the exemption from sale under legal process, or by the deed of the husband, the wife is recognized as having a present, subsisting and continuing interest in the maintenance and preservation of the benefits of their possession, and that she has such a right in the land, connected with the right of possession, that when that right is violated she is entitled to claim the protection of the courts.

Digitized by Google

In the present case, the husband has undertaken, in contravention of the express prohibition of the constitution and the statute law, to convey the entire title of the homestead tract, without the consent, and against the will of his wife. It is now a rule of property, made permanent by the fundamental law, that every head of a family is deprived of the right to alienate the homestead, unless his wife joins in the conveyance. It follows that such conveyance is absolutely void, and communicates no title to the purchaser, so far as it abridges or interferes with the wife's homestead right, and the wife by her next friend, has such an interest in the preservation of the homestead, as entitles her to invoke the protection of a court of chancery, by bill quia timet, to have the cloud upon her rights removed, and her homestead rights declared.

The decree of the Chancellor will be reversed with costs, and a decree rendered here in accordance with this opinion.

DECREE ACCORDINGLY.

Fraudulent Title Deeds.

The secretary of state of New Jersey, who, under the laws of that state is also ex officio insurance commissioner, has been investigating the affairs of the Palisades Insurance Company, a rotton concern doing business at Jersey City, and the investigation has disclosed the fact that the assets (!) of the company (nominally about $200,000) consist entirely of spurious bonds and mortgages upon real estate in New York, Brooklyn and Jersey City.

It has also led to the discovery of an organized system of swindling by the officers of the company and their confederates through the medium of forged title papers to real estate in the cities above mentioned. In the preparation of these instruments no formality which would aid in carrying out the deception was overlooked; they appeared to be in all respects regular in form and substance, duly executed, acknowledged and recorded, and when produced by the victims were in each case accompanied by full abstracts of title given by well known, trustworthy and competent, but unsuspecting lawyers.

The full extent of these forgeries is not yet known; already, however, the disclosures are of such a character as to have produced a feeling of uneasiness, apprehension and distrust amounting almost to a panic among mortgagees, owners and dealers in real estate. A New York paper thus describes the situation: "Every one who owns real estate, or has lent money on real estate security is eagerly examining his titles, or anxiously comparing the signatures on his conveyances, to prove their genuineness. The traffic in real estate has therefore almost ceased. The conspirators moulded to their purposes the very legal requirements that were intended as the safeguards of real property. The registration of conveyances was designed to render them indestructable and indubitable, to spread before every purchaser the full chain of ownership of what he wished to buy. By a single slip, one forged link in the chain, albeit surrounded by the same legal restrictions as the genuine, the safest of all investments is made the most untrustworthy, and the hundreds and thousands of inheritors and accumulators of bond and mortgage securities are aroused to the fact that their fancied securities may be worthless."

The facility with which certificates may be obtained from justices of the peace and other officers authorized to take acknowledgments to instruments affecting the title to real estate renders the perpetration of frauds of this description an easy possibility. So far as our observation has gone, all that is necessary is for some person to appear before the officer, acknowledge the deed to be his act, pay the requsite fee, and thereupon solemn attestation will be made under the hand and seal of the officer that the party constituent "is personally well known," to him, notwithstanding the fact may be that such party was an entire stranger, of whose identity he knew absolutely nothing, and of whom he had never heard before that particular occasion. Under an issue involving the genuineness of an instrument, the acknowledgment to which was taken under such circumstances, the valueless character of the testimony of the officer must be apparent.

Such certificates are neither a compliance with the letter nor spirit of the statute, and the looseness of the practice which prevails in this respect renders necessary greater circumspection on the part of those who are directly interested.—[Washington Law Reporter.

The Administration of Law in Kentucky.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I have been accustomed to read your excellent journal, with pleasure and profit, since its establishment. During this time I have rarely, if ever, had occasion to dissent from the views advanced, or statements of facts contained in your editorials. You will pardon me, therefore, while I call your attention, and the attention of your readers, to an article that appeared in the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, for September 10th, 1874 (ante, p. 448), under the title of the "Administration of the Law in the South," for the purpose of correcting, what appears to the writer, to be an erroneous statement concerning the laws of Kentucky.

In doing this, it is not my purpose to inquire into, or discuss the causes that have led to the rather unusual state of affairs that has existed, very recently, in some portions of this commonwealth. But I must be permitted to say that the extract from the Louisville Courier-Journal, incorporated into the article alluded to above, and which pretends to describe the condition of affairs in Kentucky, is more sensational than truthful. It is true the times are sadly out of joint, in this, as well as other states that do not lie south of Kentncky; but withal, I venture the assertion, that, with the exception of a few counties —not exceeding five or six—life and property are just as secure in this commonwealth as they are in the northern or western states.

In the article alluded to, on the "Administration of the Law in the South," you accept, as true, the condition of things described by the extract from the Courier-Journal, and refer it to two causes—"for one of which the people are responsible," you say, and for the other, the courts; and by way of fixing the responsibility upon the courts, you refer to the fact, that "as early as 1822 the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, decided that a statute, prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons, was unconstitutional," and that "this rule" has only been changed "within a comparatively recent period;" and cite, as evidence of this change, and I infer the time of the change also, the very late authority of Hopkins v. Com., 3 Bush (decided in 1868), and Cutsinger v. Com., 7 Bush, decided in 1870. In this you erred, as the "rule" had been changed long before either of these cases was decided.

In the present constitution of Kentucky, which went into effect on the 11th day of June, 1850, it is provided in art. 13, sec. 25, "that the rights of the citizens to bear arms, in defence of themselves and the state, shall not be questioned; but the General Assembly may pass laws to prevent persons from carrying concealed arms."

In pursuance of the authority granted by the constitution, the general assembly passed an act to prohibit the carrying of concealed deadly weapons, March 10th, 1854; (Stan. Rev. Stat., p. 414); and since that time, amendatory and distinct acts, upon this subject, have been passed, and the penalty for carrying concealed weapons has been gradually increased, from a small fine, until now the penalty is a fine from $25 to $100, and imprisonment, in the county jail, from ten to thirty days. Gen. Stat., p. 359.

Since the passage of the law of March 10th, 1854, the laws upon the subject of concealed weapons have been uniformly upheld by the courts of this state, and the most rigid construction given these statutes, consonant with the rules of law, for the purpose of insuring the conviction of offenders; and in one instance (Cutsinger v. Com., 7th Bush), the court has decided that a person carrying a pistol concealed, although proven for a harmless purpose, is a violator of the law, and subject to its penalties. Hence you will see that the "rule" was changed more than twenty years ago, and not "within a comparatively recent period."

Leaving the law of concealed weapons and passing to that of homicide, you say, in the article alluded to, that "since the late war the same court has, in a series of decisions, enunciated the extraordinary and startling doctrine that a man whose life has been threatened, by another, may kill his adversary on sight, whenever and wherever he may chance to meet him;" and reference is made to Phillips v. Com., 2 Duvall; Carico v. Com., 7 Bush, and Bohannon v. Com., 8 Bush.

Whatever warrant there may be, in the cases in 2 Duvall and 7 Bush., for the "extraordinary and startling doctrine" above referred to by you, there is certainly none to be found in the case last quoted, of Bohannon v. Com., 8 Bush, 481. Upon the contrary, the law is stated with clearness by Lindsay, J., who delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

"However this may be, the threats of even a desperate and lawless man, do not, and ought not, to authorize the person threatened to take his life; nor does any demonstration of hostility, short of a manifest attempt to commit felony, justify a measure so extreme.

"But when one's life has been repeatedly threatened by such an enemy, when an actual attempt has been made to assassinate him, and when, after all this, members of his family have been informed by his assailant that he is to be killed, on sight, we hold that he may lawfully arm himself to resist the threatened attack. He may leave his home for the transaction of his legitimate business, or for any lawful and proper purpose; and if upon such an occasion he casually meets his enemy, having reason to believe him to be armed and ready to execute his murderous intentions, and he does believe, and from the threats, the previous assault, the character of the man, and the circumstances attending the meeting, he has a right to believe that the presence of his adversary puts his life in imminent peril, and he can secure his personal safety in no other way than to kill him, he is not obliged to wait until he is actually assailed. He may not hunt his enemy and shoot him down like a wild beast, nor has he the right to bring about an unnecessary meeting, in order to have a pretext to slay him; but neither reason, nor the law, demands that he shall give up his business and abandon society to avoid such a meeting."

The opinion from which this ext act is taken was pronounced in 1871, and surely does not enunciate "the extraordinary and startling doctrine" that "a man, whose life has been threatened, may kill his adversary on sight, whenever and wherever he may chance to meet him;" and the other cases in 2 Duvall and 7 Bush, have rarely, if ever, been so construed. However that may be, they are expressly overruled in the case of Bohannon v. Com., above cited, and are not the law when they conflict with that case. The principles above enunciated by Judge Lindsay are so reasonable and just that there would be little "security for life" in a state whose code of laws did not recognize them. KENTUCKIAN.

REMARKS.—On reading the foregoing, we cheerfully concede that we were in error as to the matters indicated by "Kentuckian." We did not wish to make any invidious comparisons between different sections of the country. We desire to have what we wrote considered, as John Randolph would have expressed it, "the verba ardentia of an honest mind," sincerely desirous of seeing the supremacy of the law vindicated everywhere. We do not forget that the South occupies an exceptional position, from the fact that her population is composed of two races, so distinct in all their characteristics, that social science despairs of ever seeing them moulded into a homogeneous people. Nor do we forget that those states have lately been the theatre of a desolating civil war, and that such wars have never failed to leave behind for years after their cessation, traces of strife and disorder. We admit that the times are "sadly out of joint" in the North as well as in the South. We remember the time (in the year 1854) when it was claimed that there was not a person in jail in the state of Vermont; and now it is reported that murders have become so frequent in that commonwealth, that some of the inhabitants talk of emigrating on that account.

Obtaining Money by False Pretences—Evidence of Obtaining it on Prior and Distinct Occasions.

The recent case of The Queen v. Francis (22 W. R. 663) is one of much importance as regards the law of evidence in criminal cases. The question whether it is allowable in prosecutions for obtaining money under false pretences to give in evidence other instances of the obtaining of money under similar circumstances, has hitherto been involved in uncertainty. In R. v. Robuck (25 L. J. M. C. 101), where a prisoner was indicted for fraudulently obtaining money from a pawnbroker by pretending that a chain which was not silver was a silver chain, evidence was admitted to prove that the prisoner, a few days after the offence charged in the indictment, offered a chain similar in appearance to another pawnbrowker as a silver chain, requesting him to advance money upon it. Objection was made to the admissibility of the evidence, and the point was reserved, but the judgment in the Court of Criminal Appeal turned upon another point. In R. v. Holt (9 W. R. 74) a commercial traveller, employed to take orders, but forbidden to receive moneys, obtained money by falsely pretending that he had authority to receive it. Evidence that he had subsequently obtained money from another customer by a like false pretence was admitted, and the prisoner was convicted. The question was reserved whether this evidence was rightly admitted, and the court quashed the conviction, saying that on the facts stated in the case they could not find any ground for saying that the evidence was admissible. In neither of these cases did counsel appear for the prisoner; in the former the point as to the admissibilty of the evidence was not raised in argument (see 25 L. J. M. C., at p. 102, note) or adverted to in the judgment, and in the latter, no reasons are given by the judges.

In a recent case, however, the point was expressly reserved and fully discussed, and the court lay down a rule upon the subject. The facts, so far as they concerned the abstract point of law, were very simple. The prisoner obtained money by pretending that a certain ring was made of diamonds, when in truth it was composed of crystals. In support of this charge, evidence was given that on a prior occasion the prisoner had obtained money by pretending that a silver chain coated with gold was made of pure gold. This latter piece of evidence was objected to as inadmissible, and the point was reserved, but the Court of Criminal Appeal held that it was admissible. "It seems clear upon principle," said Lord COLRIDGE, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, "that when the fact of the prisoner having done the thing charged is proved, and the only remaining question is whether, at the time he did it, he had guilty knowledge of the quality of his act, or acted under a mistake, evidence of the class received must be admissible. It tends to show that he was pursuing a course of similar acts, and thereby it raises a presumption that he was not acting under a mistake."

The question may be put thus: In a series of similar transactions by the same person, which is more probable — repeated error or repeated fraud? If this question were put barely, the answer must be, repeated error is more probable than repeated fraud, for error is more common than fraud. But add the circumstances that the transactions are of a lucrative kind, that the statement is in each case are of essential importance to the transaction (and is not therefore made per incuriam), and that the untrue statement is always in favor of the person making it, and the question must be answered differently. The man who in a series of lucrative transactions makes statements which are in fact untrue, and which are always to his own advantage, may properly be held guilty of fraud, unless he is able to offer a satisfactory explanation. But by what accumulation of circumstances is the mere suspicion of fraud which a single such instance raises changed into such a certainty of fraud as will justify a finding of fraud as a fact? It is impossible to say. But each instance increases the weight of the evidence.

Take the analogous case (which has been recognized by the legislature) of uttering counterfeit coin coupled with the possession of other pieces of counterfeit coin (24 and 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 10). Can it be denied that the possession of other counterfeit coins give good reason to suppose that the utterer knew the coin to be couterfeit? But how many connterfeit coins possessed will lead to the inference of knowledge? Clearly a roll or packet of coins would be conclusive. But the possession of one coin is some evidence. Is there any difference between the nature or grounds of the inference in this case and in that in question?

There are many circumstances to be taken into account in estimating the weight of such evidence. The lapse of time, making exact proof of the circumstances imputing guilt, or tending to exonerate, difficult; the number of articles or instances, and many other circumstances not admitting of definite description, must be brought carefully before the jury, and are likely to be fairly and candidly considered by them. But if any such instance tends to prove the knowledge which is in question—and it must be admitted that it does so tend—there seems no ground on which it can be pronounced inadmissible.

The reason of practical necessity on which the admission of such evidence has been based is in itself not complete; but, as a supplementary argument, is of great weight. That reason is thus expressed by HEATH, J., in Whiley's case (2 Leach C. C., at p. 986)—"The charge in this case puts in proof the knowledge of the prisoner, and, as that knowledge cannot be collected from the circumstances of the transaction itself, it must necessarily be collected from other facts and circumstances." Unles indirect proof of the guilty knowledge is admitted, it would be impossible in many cases to prove this essential element in the offenc e.

It has been urged, on the other hand, that upon principle it seems difficult to stop short of the admission of evidence of independent acts to show the prisoner to be a bad man, for that is to make it less likely that he was acting under a mistake; but evidence of particular acts to show bad character is not admissible. It may be difficult to draw the line in principie, but is it not perfectly defined in practice? The admission of evidence to prove that a prisoner has been pursuing a course of acts of a similar kind to that with which he is charged, where guilty knowledge of a particular set of facts is one of the issues to be proved, is a different thing from admitting evidence of any criminal act to prove a general bad character. The difference between the two cases is greatest in the point which is alleged as constituting the strongest objection to the admission of the former kind of evidence—the alleged hardship on the accused caused by taking him by surprise and so depriving him of the opportunity of rebutting the evidence. In the first case the prisoner or his advisor must be aware that guilty knowledge is one of the facts to be proved against him: that it cannot be proved from the circumstances of the transaction itself, and that if proved at all it must be proved from certain previous transactions of a similar nature. There is a specific class of acts pointed out, as to which the prisoner must be prepared with evidence. On the other hand, if evidence of acts showing general bad character were admissable to prove guilty knowledge, the prisoner would be without clue as to what kind of offence would be given in evidence. "The observation respecting prisoners being taken by surprise, and coming unprepared to answer, and to defend themselves against extrinsic facts," says Lord ELLENBOROUGH in R. v. Whiley (2 Leach. C. C., at p. 985), "is not correct. The indictment alleges that the prisoners altered this note knowing it to be forged, and they must know that without the reception of other evidence than that which the mere circumstances of the transaction itself would furnish, it would be impossible to ascertain whether they altered it with a guilty knowledge of its having been forged or whether it was altered under circumstances which showed their minds to be free from that guilt."

Still we cannot but feel that (since it is not to be presumed that prisoners will have the benefit of legal advice) an indictment merely charging the prisoner with a particular act does not give him such warning as he is entitled to, that other similar acts will be put in evidence, and we would repeat what we said before (17 S. J. 479) with reference to the question of evidence raised in R. v. Cotton, that it seems to us worthy of consideration whether the true remedy for the alleged hardship on the prisoner caused by the admission of the class of evidence to which we have referred, would not be to change the fixed practice which now prevails, and to indict the prisoner in one indictment for all the cases of false pretences in respect of which evidence is proposed to be given.—[Solicitors' Journal.

MEMORIES OF WESTMINISTER HALL. By EDWARD FOSS. Vol. II. James Corkcroft & Co., N. Y. Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, St. Louis, Mo. 1874.

The second volume of this interesting collection of incidents, anecdotes and historical sketches, relating to Westminister Hall is published, and fully justifies the character which we ascribed to the first volume. This volume is made particularly interesting by its very full and clear account of the Tichborne trial, accompied by illustrations of the court and counsel, and fac similes of the hand writing of Roger Tichborne and Arthur Orton, as shown in letters introduced on this remarkable trial.

LIVES OE THE CHIEF JUSTICES OF ENGLAND. Contiuation by Sir JOSEPH ARNOULD, late judge of the High Court of Bombay. Vol. 6. St. Louis: Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, 1874.

This volume brings down the Lives of the Chief Justices, to the retirement of Lord Denman, in 1850, and the appointment of Lord Campbell as his successor. Lord Campbell wrote the lives of the chief justices to Denman's time, and the 5th and 6th volumes of the present edition (the handsomest and best ever published in this country) are appropriated to Arnould's life of Denman, who for over seventeen years, filled so honorably and ably, the high office of Chief Justice of England. Denman presided in the court during an important era in the history of our more recent jurisprudence, and earned the title of the "good and great" chief justice. Mr. Edward Everett in a letter to him, on the occasion of his resignation truthfully observed: "Your course as a statesman and magistrate, and in both capacities, as a great asserter of liberal principles, has probably commanded a more unanimous sympathy in the United States than even in your own England." Every American lawyer will feel a more intimate acquaintance with English law, by reading the lives of these sages—lives full of struggle, but crowned with lasting and well deserved honors.

Notes and Queries.

BURLINGTON, IOWA, Aug. 31, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Suppose I should desire to take the deposition of a witness, a resident of any country in Europe; for illustration say Berlin, Prussia, the testimony to be used in trying a cause in Iowa. How would I proceed to get the deposition? Please answer fully.

CONSTANT READER.

ANSWER.—A commission (dedimus potestatem) should be sued out of the office of the clerk of the court, upon "reasonable notice," directed to some commissioner of deeds, notary public, consul or consular agent of the United States, either by name or by the designation of his office, within the limits of whose official jurisdiction the witness is. Iowa Code of 1873, §§ 3725-3727. We are not aware that any of the American States have "commissioners of deeds" in foreign countries. It would seem clear that such a deposition could, under section 3725 of the Iowa code, be taken before a notary public in England, or a notary France, or before the corresponding officer in Germany. But the safest way would be to write to the secretary of state for the name of the consul or consular agent of the United States, within whose jurisdiction the witness is, and direct to such consul or consular agent a commission, with interrogatories, as in other cases, enclosing an adequate fee.

Another mode, which it is supposed any court of justice may resort to, indepently of any statute and by virtue of its inherent powers, is by a letter rogatory, addressed to a foreign tribunal within whose jurisdiction the witness is, requesting such court, in furtherance of justice, to cause the deposition to be taken, and promising to do the same thing, when required, for the court of which this favor is requested. This mode of taking the depositions of witnesses residing abroad, is detailed in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 320 and note 3. It may be added that, in taking such a deposition, the forms of our law, and not of the foreign law, must be pursued. The letter rogatory should therefore be accompanied with the usual instructions.

ST. LOUIS, MO., Sept. 12, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A. is renting a store by the month from C., at $40 per month. B. offers him $200 to move out and give him possession. A. accepts the offer with proviso that he be allowed to remain until he gets another house. In two weeks time he moves out and tenders the key to B., which B. refuses to accept.

The contract was not in writing. Was it within the Statute of Frauds? Is it an "interest in lands?" W. F.

We shall be pleased to have some of our readers answer the above question and refer to the authorities bearing upon it.

JACKSON, TENN., Sept. 13, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A. is a citizen of Tennessee, and as such is entitled to the benefit of the exemption laws of said state. He, however, concludes to move to Illinois, and in pursuance of this intention goes to Illinois, selects a location, and writes to his family and friends hear that he has determined to locate in I., in the state of Illinois. He soon after returns to Tennessee, sells off a portion of his property, boxes up the remainder, marks the name of his future home in Illinois on the different articles, and hauls them to the depot for shipment, when they are attached. He moves his family to Illinois, comes back to Tennessee, and replevies the goods attached, claiming them under the exemption laws of the state of Tennessee. When does a person cease to be a citizen?

Please give us an article in your next settling the points raised by the above stated facts, and oblige yours truly, T. A. B.

ANSWER.—One of the editors of this journal is preparing for publication an extended essay on the law of homesteads and exemptions. When he gets to the chapter embracing the above named topic, he will endeavor to comply with the above request.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Irish Law Times, for August 29, has leaders on Irish Municipal Elections, The British Association at Belfast, the Irish Jury System, and the Principles of Life Assurance. Its reports contain in Cleary v. Lenihan, an intersting decision in the law of slander, which we shall notice in our notes of cases hereafter and in Ramsey v. Quinn, an interesting exposition of the law of master and servant, holding that the master of a ship and a seaman are not fellow-servants within the rule which exempts the master from liability for injuries committed by one servant on another, while engaged in a common employment. This we publish in full this week. It also pays Mr. Justice WAGNER, of the Supreme Court of Missouri, the compliment of republishing his able opinion in Harriman v. Stowe (ante, p. 400). It also reports other cases, but they would not be of interest to our readers.

The American Law Times Reports, for September, contain Hill v. Whitcomb, United States Circuit Court, District of Massachusetts (Shepley, J.) infringement of patent. Also Grover & Baker S. M. Co. v. Florence S. M. See 18 Wall. 553. Also Brady v. American Steamship Co., which we have heretofore noticed.

Also three decisions in bankruptcy of Mr. District Judge Blatchford; that in re Scull, which we have already noticed (ante, p. 399); that in re Hill, where the learned judge holds that the signature of his initials to a memorandum upon the petition prior to June 22, 1874, do not warrant the signing of an order of adjudication, after that date, nunc pro tunc; and that in re Keeler, where he holds that the admission of the debtor that the terms of the law have been complied with will not dispense with such allegation.

Also a decision of Mr. District Judge Longyear, rendered January last, holding that notaries public are officers before whom affidavits may be taken and bills and answers verified within the meaning of existing laws; and that affidavits entitled as in a cause pending, when no such cause was in existence, cannot be read unless the entitling be rejected, which, if it render the affidavits meaningless in material particulars, will not be allowed.

The Legal Intelligencer, for September 11, publishes a number of interesting decisions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

In Columbia Ins. Co. v. Masonheimer, the court say that the secretary of an insurance company is the organ of communication with the policy holders, and has authority to inform a holder of the cancellation of his policy. On such cancellation there can be no recovery of the assessment on premium rate. The language of the secretary in this case is construed to be a notification of cancellation.

In Warfel v. Frantz, it is ruled that if a surety signs and delivers his bond on the express condition that his co-sureties should sign it, unless such condition is complied with, it cannot be enforced. Express assent to such condition by the obligee is not necessary.

The following is the syllabus of Bucher v. The Dillsburg & Mechanicsville R. R. Co.:

A subscription to stock of a proposed railroad, made upon a blank sheet of paper, which, it was stipulated, should not be binding or attached to the "heading" (which contained the terms of the association) until the subscriber had inspected and approved the instrument, is not binding until that assent.

Semble, that there can be no valid subscription to the stock of the company incorporated under the act of April 4th, 1868, without the payment of ten per cent. by each subscriber.

And the following that of Hickman v. Blackmire:

As a general rule, "dying without issue" means an indefinite failure of issue, and such a limitation would create an estate tail. But such construction is controlled by the manifest intent of the testator, otherwise gathered from the whole will.

In this case it was held that the phrase referred to a definite failure of issue, and that by the limitation the devisee took the defeasible estate; which terminated at his death.

In French v. Schooner Victoria, The Hazel Dell and Victoria—two sailing vessels close hauled, and having the wind on different sides—were beating up a narrow inlet against a head wind, when a collision took place. Held:

1. That by the 12th and 17th Articles of the Rules and Regulations for preventing Collisions, (13 Stat. 58,) it was the duty of the Hazel Dell—the wind on her port side and being the overtaken vessel—to give way and to keep out of the way of the Victoria.

2. That whilst by the 18th Article the Victoria, under ordinary circumstances, was entitled to hold her course, she was bound by the 19th Article, from the special circumstances of the particular case, to depart from the rule in order to avoid the immediate danger.

3. That the evidence brought the case within the principles of The Maria Martin, (12 Wall. 31,) and the damages caused by the collision should be devided equally between the libellant and respondent.

The Intelligencer also republishes from this journal, Hamlin v. Pettibone (ante, p. 404.

The Pacific Law Reporter, for February 15, publishes Minturn v. Smith, U. S. District Court for California, Sawyer, Circuit Judge,—subject, tax deed, injunction, cloud upon title.

Also the decision of the Supreme Court of California in re Ah Fook, et al., being a party of lewd and debauched Chinese women brought over on the steamer Japan. The court hold that the "Burlingame Treaty" does not prevent the state legislature from prohibiting the landing in the state of persons deemed and designated under the law as objectionable for reasons personal in themselves and not dependent on nationality; and that the legislature has the power to authorize the commissioner of immigration to determine whether particular individuals come within the prohibitions of the state law.

The Pacific Law Reporter, for September 8, reports the case of the St. Helens Mill Co., U. S. District Court for Oregon, in which Mr. District Judge Deady, rules the following points:

A corporation cannot execute a deed otherwise than under its seal.

A lien by way of mortgage can on only be created by a deed under seal.

An assignee represents the rights of the creditors and each of them, as well as the bankrupt, and may therefore maintain or defend proceedings in regard to the property of the latter, which on grounds of public policy or otherwise, he would not be allowed to.

A corporation cannot make a deed unless the directors, or a majority of them, meet together as a board, and so determine; and the only evidence of such meeting and action is the "record" required to be kept by the secretary.

A stockholder's meeting has no authority to elect a president and secretary of the corporation.

Meeting of stockholders without notice is invalid.

It also publishes without a syllabus the case of The San Francisco & North Pacific R. R. Co. v. Bee, under the following heading: "Corporation—Conveyance—Levy—Consideration—Breach of Statute."

Its other cases are of local importance only, and have no syllabus.

The Chicago Legal News closes its sixth volume with its number for September 19, and furnishes an index and table of cases.

It publishes an opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Drummond, J., in Wheeler v. Bates, holding that since the passage of the statute of February 16th, 1874, the United States Circuit Courts in Illinois have, in proper cases, jurisdiction of actions of forcible entry and detainer; that such action is a "suit of civil nature" within the meaning of the act of Congress of 1789.

Opinion of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Blodgett, J., in re McDowell et al., construing the recent amendment to the bankrupt law, and holding, as a general rule, that when a debtor has had a meeting of his creditors, duly called and held, and has had his proposition for a settlement duly considered and passed upon, he should abide by the decision then had, and not be permitted to annoy creditors by requiring their attendance at further meetings. In the case before the court the object of the meeting failed, by reason of the failure to properly instruct the attorneys who represented the dissenting creditors, and another meeting was directed to be called for the purpose of again considering and acting upon the debtor's offer for a composition. The editor ot the Legal News says: "We do not remember to have seen any decision upon the point involved in this case. It is undoubtedly the first under the new provision of the bankrupt law."

Also an opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Oregon, by Deady, J., in re Comstock, holding that the provision of the act of June 22, 1874, amendatory of the bankrupt act, requiring one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of the creditors to join in a petition for an adjudication in bankruptcy, in cases commenced prior to its passage and since December 1, 1873, does not apply to any such cases in which there had been an adjudication prior to the date of the act; that a petition in bankruptcy is a suit, and an adjudication of bankruptcy thereon is a final judgment, which is beyond the power of Congress to set aside. We suppose this point may now be regarded as settled. See re Raffauf, 10 N. B. R., 69; 6 Chicago Legal News, 341; re Angell, 6 Chicago Legal News, 341; re Rosenthal, 1 Cent. L. J., 364; 6 Chicago Legal News, 342; re Pickering, 1 Cent. L. J., 372; re Obear, and re Thomas, id. 362.

The Legal News also publishes the decision (in full) of Mr. District Judge Blatchford, in re Franke. See ante p. 448.

Also an opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by McAllister, J., in Badgly v. Votrain, holding, under the written assignment recited in the opinion, where a grandfather assigned to one of his grandchildren certain notes and mortgages, but never delivered them, and was to collect and have the interest thereon during his life, and they were to be delivered at his death to the grandchild, and if the grandchild died first they were to be retained by the grandfather, that said assignment was in its nature testamentary, and that after the death of the grandfather intestate, a court of equity had no power to decree that his administrator should deliver up the notes and mortgages to the grandchild, or the one-third of the estate, which was also, by the terms of the instrument, to be given to the same grandchild. "This opinion," says the editor of the Legal News, "is of unusual interest. It would seem, however, to be but carrying out the provisions of our statute, which requires wills to be executed in the presence of two witnesses, etc. There certainly is good reason for requiring instruments, in their nature testamentary, which are not calculated to dispose of the property of the donor until his death, to be executed in accordance with the provisions of the statute of wills."

—IT is stated that a number of Wisconsin grain shippers have kept all bills paid for freight since the Potter law went into effect, and now that the supreme court has affirmed the constitutionality of the act, they will proceed to sue the companies for the difference between the lawful rates and those paid, and also for penalties.

—NEW HAMPSHIRE COURTS.—The following are the names and ages of the judges of the Superior Court of Judicature, and the Circuit Court of New Hampshire, as at present consituted :

Superior court of judicature : Edmund L. Cushing, C J., age 67 ; William S. Ladd, age 44 : Isaac W. Smith, age 49.

—THE Supreme Court of California, in a habeas corpus case of twenty-three Chinese women, brought to San Francisco per steamer Japan, has decided that the state law, which regulates such immigration, is constitutional, and remanded the women to the master of the steamer Japan to be returned to China. An attempt has been made to get the case into the federal court, on the ground that it involves the construction of a treaty between the United States and China.

—SOME time since, before the Supreme Court of Illinois, the question was argued whether an indictment charging three men jointly with striking the prosecutor with a club would support a conviction—in other words, whether three men could, at the same time, strike a fourth man with the same club. We should think such a case would be one calling for expert testimony before the jury, rather than capable of being settled upon a motion in arrest of judgment ; since the question would seem to depend entirely upon the length of the club. Mr. Attorney-General Edsall represented the club, and Professor Van Buren Denslow, of Chicago, argued the case for the clubbists. We have not learned how the question was decided.

—HON. JOHN S. KERR, a lawyer of Memphis, Tennessee, a member of the legislature of that state, fell dead at a dinner-table on the 15th instant. Col. Kerr stood well at the bar, but his extremely active and restless temperment, unfitted him for the patient plodding, which is necessary to the highest success as a lawyer. He was extremely attached to his friends, and affable and courteous to all men. We doubt whether he had any enemies, except what are termed political enemies, and toward these he was generous and candid. He did not belong to that school of politicians who ostracise others on account of their opinions. He was, in short, a liberal and generous representative of the young South, and his death at this time, in the flower of his strength, and in midst of his usefulness, is a matter for deep regret.

—A CONVENTION of insurance commissions which has recently held a session at Detroit, passed resolutions to the effect that taking mortgages to secure subscription to stock is unlawful and adverse to the interests of the insuring public ; that taxation of aggregate receipts of insurance companies is wrong ; that the usual return of companies in their annual statement of assets should not include the company's own stock or loans on it, or stock in any other company of the same character, office furniture, supplies, money advanced agents on premiums more than three months overdue ; and recommending that laws be framed to prohibit reinsurance after six months from the time the reinsured risk was taken, except upon the written consent of the policy-holders.

—CLUSERET, whom most Americans have heard of, has had a law suit with the publishers of a Swiss journal. He had an engagement with them to write souvenirs, but they, finding that the sale of their journal was likely to be suspended in France, got frightened and refused to publish his articles. He sued them for 16af. for copy already furnished, and 10,000f. damages for the loss of the money he might have made on copy to come. There was a contract, and the court held that the editors had fair opportunity to know what sort of literary material Cluseret would furnish ; that they had stopped him and he was ready to go on. So he was judged right in his demand, and received a verdict ; but not for 10,000f., as the court did not take him at his own valuation, but cut the damages down to 800f.

—THE LITCHFIELD LAW SCHOOL.—The first law school in the country, of any note was founded at Litchfield, Ct., by Dr. Bellamy, about twenty-five years before the revolutionary war. The law school at Litchfield owed its origin to Tappan Reeve, a native of Long Island, a graduate at Nassau Hill, a son-in-law of President Burr, and so a brother-in-law of Aaron Burr, vice-president of the United States, and was begun in 1784, just after the revolution was over. Some time afterward Judge Reeve formed a co-partnership with James Gould, a lawyer in Litchfield, and a graduate of Yale College, who became the head of the school in 1820, on the retirement of Judge Reeve, and afterward associated himself with Jabez W. Huntington, afterwards senator of the United States and judge of the Supreme Court of Connecticut. Down to 1833, about five years before the death of Judge Gould, there had been educated at Litchfield 1,024 lawyers from all parts of the United States, of whom 183 were from the Southern states. In this number are included fifteen United States senators, five cabinet officers in the general government, ten governors of states, fifty members of Congress, forty judges of the highest state courts, and two judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.—[Springfield Union.

—THERE appear to be some peculiarities in matters legal in the Orient, as the following extracts from some of our exchanges would seem to testify : Liu Chang-yeo, Governor of Kwangsi, denounces the acting magistrate of Ts'uan Chow for "recklessness and wanton severity." The governor had already heretofore laid down strict rules concerning the method to be pursued by district magistrates in capital cases. All persons found guilty of murder were to be sent to the high provincial authorities for sentence, and only in extreme cases was authority to be granted, on application, for execution on the spot. Notwithstanding this, the functionary complained of — who was already laboring under a charge of wrongfully releasing a prisoner on bail while in another magistracy — has actually of his own motion beheaded a prisoner, without awaiting the reply to the application he had sent up for permission to execute the sentence locally, on grounds wholly inadequate. The reason alleged for this precipitancy is that the prisoner was in so precarious a condition that, unless executed forthwith, it was doubtful whether he would live long enough to be made a public example. A rescript directs that the offending magistrate be stripped of his rank, and placed on trial to answer for his shortcomings.—[Irish Law Times.

Notes of Cases.

Railroads.—Liability of Company for Wanton and Malicious Acts of Employees.—Where the servants of a railroad company, while in the discharge of their duties, pervert the appliances of the company to wanton and malicious purposes to the injury of others, the company is liable for such injuries. Opinion by WALKER, J. C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Dickson, 63 Ill, 151.

———. Comparative Negligence—Erroneous Instruction in Regard to—Whether will Reverse.—In an action against a railroad company to recover for injuries to the plaintiff, occasioned by alleged negligence of the defendant, the court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury incorrectly in regard to the rule of comparative negligence : Held, as the evidence showed no negligence on the part of the plaintiff to compare with that of the defendant, the latter could not be heard to complain of the erroneous instruction. Ibid.

———. Constitutional Law—Regulating Speed of Railway Trains, etc.—By the grant of corporate franchises to railroad companies to procure the right of way and operate their trains by the power of steam, the state does not deprive itself of its inherent power to enact all police laws necessary and proper to protect the life and property of its citizens. Opinion by THORNTON, J. T. P. & W. R. W. Co. v. Duran, 63 Ill. 91.

2. By such charters, unlimited discretion in the regulation of the speed of trains is not conferred. Among the rights reserved, and which must inhere in the state, is the power to regulate the approaches to, and the crossing of, public highways, and the passage through cities and villages, where life and property are constantly in imminent danger by the rapid speed of railway trains. The exercise of corporate franchises must yield to public exigencies and the safety of the community. Ibid.

———. Ordinance—Speed of Railway Trains.—The corporate authorities of the town of Cuba enacted the following ordinance : "That it shall be unlawful for any railroad company, by themselves or their agents, to run at a greater speed within the corporate limits of the town of Cuba than five miles per hour ;" and provided a penalty for its violation, not less than $10 nor more than $100 : Held, That the corporate authorities had the power under the statute to pass the same, and that while it was somewhat informal, its meaning was plain enough to be easily understood. Ibid.

———. Negligence—Evidence of—Burden of Proof.—Where a railroad company runs its trains through the limits of an incorporated city or village at a greater rate of speed than is permitted by the ordinances of such city or village, if any live stock is killed by such train, the killing, by the stat ute, will be presumed to have been done through the negligence of the company ; and in an action by the owner of the stock, proof of the killing and violation of the ordinance will make out a prima facie case of negligence, and throw the onus upon the company to rebut this presumption of law. Ibid.

———. When Liable for Injury to one Employee through the Fault of Another.—If a servant of a railroad company be injured through the incompetency and unskillfulness of a fellow-servant, or in consequence of defects in machinery or track, and the company be guilty of negligence in the employment and retention of such agent, or in the construction and repair of its machinery and track, it is liable in damages. Opinion by SCOTT, J. Chicago & Alton R. Co. v. Sullivan, Adm'x, 63 Ill. 293.

———. Habitual Intemperance of a conductor, under circumstances bringing knowledge thereof to his employers, is sufficient to render them liable for injury resulting therefrom. Ibid.

———. Contributory Negligence.—Partial or slight negligence and inattention of the party injured will not bar recovery, when palpable negligence of the employer is proven. Ibid.

———. Action Against for Killing Employee, by what Law Governed.—An action by a wife against a railroad company for the homicide of her husband by the negligence of its servants, in the runntng of its train, is an action depending for its existence on the law of the state where the homicide occurred, and when such homieide occurred in the state of Tennessee, the right of action is in such person or persons as is provided by the law of Tennessee. Western & Atlantic Railroad Company v. Mary Strong. Supreme Court of Georgia, Sept. 8, 1874, opinion by MCCAY, J.

———. ———. Who Must Sue.—When the right of action for the homicide of a husband and father, is given by law to the personal representative, for the use of the wife and children, the wife cannot sue alone and in her own name. Ibid.

———. ———. Nature of the Action.—An action for the homicide of a husband by the running of rail cars, charged to be by reason of negligence, either in the railroad company or its servants, is an action, sounding in tort, and not an action excontractu, but in determining whether the railroad company is liable, the relation of the deceased to the railroad, whether as an employee, or passenger, or stranger, are essential elements in deciding whether the killing was wrongful. The rights of the wife or the representative to sue, depends upon the wrongfulness of the killing, and if the killing occurred under such circumstances as, by the laws of the place of the killing, or by a legal contract between the parties, the railroad company was not guilty of any breach of duty to the deceased, the right of action does not accrue. Although the language of our code, section 2971, would seem to give a wife the right to sue for homicide of her husband, in broad terms and without qualification, yet, in deciding whether a right to recover damages in any case exists, it must appear that the killing was a wrong, that is, that the defendant in such killing was guilty of a breach of duty, express or implied, which was due to the deceased, and if there was no such breach there can be no recovery. Ibid.

———. ———. Right of Railroad Company to Limit its Liability by Contract.—If a railroad employee contract with his employer that he will assume all the risks of his employment, and will not hold the company liable for the negligence of its servants, and he be killed under such circumstances as, under his contract, and under the law, he could not, had he lived, have recovered damages for an injury received, then his wife cannot recover damages for his death. The basis of the right of action in both cases is a breach of duty implied by law or assumed by contract, and if there be no such breach by the defendant, the wife cannot recover. Ibid.

NOTE.—The contract in the foregoing case between the railroad company appears to have been executed upon the following blank:

Office of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, ———— 187.—

This agreement witnesseth, that ———— has, at his own request, this day been employed on said railroad; and it is hereby understood between the parties and expressly agreed that the said ———— in consideration that the said Western & Atlantic Railway Company will hire and pay him the wages stipulated, which is more than he can get elsewhere; will take upon himself all risk connected with or incident to his position on the road; and will, in no case, hold the company liable for any injury or damage he may sustain, while so employed, in his person or otherwise, by what are called accidents or collisions on the trains or road, or which may result from the negligence, carelessness, or misconduct of himself or any other employee or person connected with said road, or in the service of said company, or from any other cause.

And it is fnrther agreed, that the company is to pay the said ———— for no time lost from its service by accident, disability, or otherwise, but is to pay at the rate which may from time to time be agreed upon, only for the services actually rendered by the said ———— and the company reserves the right to discharge him, whenever they are not satisfied to retain him. And the said ———— expressly waives and relinquishes any and all legal rights he may have, that are in conflict with this contract, and assumes all risk.

In witness whereof, the said ———— and said company, by Joseph E. Brown, its president, have hereunto set thesr hands and seals

PRESIDENT W. & A. R. R. COMPANY.

We have not seen the full opinion in the case of which we give an abstract above; but we are clearly of the conviction that the clause in the above blank form of contract which we have italicised, is contrary to public policy, and one which no court of justice ought to enforce. The correct principle, in our judgment, is that the state is interested in preserving the lives of its citizens; and hence will not permit a railroad company, or any other person or corporation, to stipulate against civil responsibility for homicides committed through its own negligence. This view becomes still more clear, and strikes the mind with more force, when it is considered that the state punishes such negligent homicides as felonies. We doubt whether any part of such a contract, which stipulates against liability for the consequences of the negligence of the railroad company, ought to be sustained. See an able discussion on this question by Mr. Justice BERRY of the Supreme Court of Minnesota, in Jacobus v. St. Paul, etc. Ry. Co., ante, p. 375.

If considerations of public policy will supervene to prevent a common carrier from stipulating against the consequences of his own negligence, in respect to the care of inanimate merchandise, may not such considerations be much more strongly urged where a master endeavors, by contract, to stipulate against responsibility for the negligent killing or injuring of his servant? In those exceptional cases where a recovery is permited against a master by a servant, for an injury caused by a fellow-servant, it is upon the theory that the master, as well as the servant, has been negligent—that is, that the master has been negligent in selecting an unskilful servant. So far, therefore, as the above contract seeks to change any existing rule of law, it seems clear that it is against public policy and void. The idea that the state will permit one of its citizens, for an increase of wages, to contract away his life or personal safety by a stipulation with another citizen, which, in effect, says, "if you injure me or kill me through your negligence, neither I, in the one case, nor my personal representative in the other, will hold you responsible"—is monstrous.

Besides, to sustain such contracts as valid, cannot fail to have a tendency to diminish the care exercised by the railway company in the selection of its servants; nor can it fail to increase the number of reckless and irresponsible servants in the employ of the company; and in both of these ways the danger to the traveling public is increased—another reason why such contracts conflict with public policy. Indeed, to sustain such contracts seems as impolitic as a rule of law would be which would require the persons on board a ship in distress to throw over the sailors in order to save the passengers; for as respects the sailors, "unless these abide in the ship, all will perish."

Statute of Frauds—Sale by Auction—Memorandum in Writing—Entry in Sales book by Auctioneer's Clerk.—The plaintiff sent a mare to be sold by auction at the defendant's repository. The defendant advertised the mare for sale by auction on the 28th of March, 1872, and circulated a printed catalogue of the horses to be sold at his sale, with conditions of sale annexed, in which the plaintiff's mare was described as lot 49. The defendant had a sales-ledger, which was headed "Sales by Auction, 28th March, 1872," in which the plaintiff's mare was also numbered 49; but neither the catalogue nor the conditions of the sale were annexed to the sales, ledger, nor were they referred to therein. On the 28th of March, 1872, the lots described in the catalogue were put up by the defendant for sale under the conditions. The plaintiff's mare was put up for sale and knocked down to M. for £33, and thereupon the defendant's clerk wrote in the columns of the sales-ledger, left blank for this purpose, the name of M. as purchaser, and the price. M. afterward refused to take the mare:—Held, that the catalogue and the conditions of sale were not suffieiently connected with the entries in the sales-ledger to make a note or memorandum in writing of a contract by M. to satisfy section 17 of the statute of frauds. Semble, that the entry by the clerk was not by an authorized agent so as to bind the purchaser. Pierce v. Corf, L. R., 9 Q. B. 210.

Master and Servant—Service for "Twelve Months Certain"—Notice—Continuance of Service beyond the Twelve Months.—The defendant agreed to serve the plaintiff as a traveler and agent "for twelve months' certain," after which time either party should be at liberty to terminate the agreement by giving the other a three-month's notice. Held, (by Bramwell and Pigot, BB., Kelly, C. B., dissenting), that at the close of the twelve months the agreement could be determined by either party without any notice, and that the stipulation as to a three-mouths notice only applied in case the engagement was prolonged beyond the twelve months. Langton v. Carleton, L. R., 9 Ex. 57.

Right of Creditors to Oppose Bankrupt's Discharge.—A creditor has no absolute right to appear and oppose the discharge of a bankrupt after the return day of the order to show cause, though the proceedings may have been adjourned for other purposes. But the court may permit opposition to be made at any time before the discharge is granted, and if a creditor who has duly filed specifications of opposition is about to withdraw them, other creditors may be permitted to carry on the opposition, on good cause shown. In re Houghton, U. THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. }

COMMON CARRIERS—JUDGE BALLARD'S RECENT DECISON.—The recent opinion of Mr. District Judge Ballard on the liability of express companies in case of the loss of goods in railroad accidents (ante, p. 436), appears to have attracted an unusual degree of attention among the profession, no less on account of the importance of the question itself, than on account of the strong reasoning with which the learned judge enforces his view of it. We elsewhere print two communications criticising his opinion, to which we ask the attention of our readers.

LAW SCHOOLS.—The Albany Law Journal congratulates the State of Pennsylvania on the fact that it possesses but one law school. It says:

There are some reasons why our neighboring state should be congratulated on having but one law school. The principal reason is that the profession will not be likely to be crowded with young lawyers possessing but a smattering of theoretical knowledge of the law, and knowing absolutely nothing of the practical features of the law. In New York we have the disadvantage of as many as three law schools, which are empowered to give a diploma entitling the graduate to admission to the bar, after a purely theoretical study of the law, comprising a period of from nine months to two years, in which the student learns no more law than any well-educated, non-professional person ought to know. Undoubtedly law schools have their uses; but, as at present conducted, they should be only accessory to a good practical office-training.

JUDICIAL INTEGRITY.—In an interview with a reporter of the New York Herald, Mr. Charles O'Conor so far forgot that discretion which becomes defeated counsel, as to intimate that the late decision of the New York Court of Appeals, in what are known as the "Ring Suits," was influenced by political motives. We regret that one who stands, both in respect of his ability and professional integrity, confessedly at the head of the American bar, should have set such an example to his professional brethren, and we trust it will turn out that the reporter misunderstood his remarks. We have been accustomed to hear laymen accuse judges of deciding legal questions on political grounds; witness, for instance, the insinuation made by the editor of Harpers' Weekly against the opinion of Chief Justice Chase in the legal tender cases. But until a judge commits a flagrant and palpable breach of duty, the good opinion of the bar should hedge him round about. Counsel should endeavor, by their courteous and honorable treatment of the judges, to make them feel that they are honorable men, whether they are intrinsically so or not. Such treatment will preserve the integrity of a good judge, and improve that of a bad one.

WHEN THE REVISED STATUTES OF THE UNITED STATES TAKE EFFECT.—The Daily Register, referring to an article in the Albany Law Journal on this question, says:

In Title 1, chap. 1, sec. 5, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, our learned brother of Albany will find the information—the lack of which causes him so much vexation—to wit: the time when the revised statutes take effect. By referring as above directed, all concerned will learn that all the laws of the United States in existence previous to December 1, 1873, which have simply been re-enacted, without any alteration, shall continue in force as heretofore; and that all of that part of the United States revised statutes which comprises a re-enactment of the general and permanent acts and resolutions of Congress, in force up to the time of such re-enactment, with such modifications as are deemed expedient, shall take effect at the expiration of the session of Congress which shall be convened during one year following the president's approval of such revised statutes.

It seems to us that this provision is sufficiently explicit. And yet, ever since our publication of this information, a month ago, we have been in receipt of quite a number of communications asking for the source of our information, and some of them questioning its correctness. We presume that all these persons, as well as our contemporary of Albany, have sought to find this provision in the tail, rather than in the head of the revised statutes.

According to the above, the revised statutes do not take effect until the expiration of the next session of Congress. If this is so, the editor of the Albany Law Journal, and the correspondents of the Daily Register, are not the only ones that need light on this question; for some of the departments of the government are now issuing instructions to their subordinates, based upon the revised statutes, and assuming them to be now in force.

POLITICS AND THE BENCH.—The Albany Law Journal, commenting on a recent article in this journal (ante, p. 435) on the subject of the propriety of judges permitting their names to be used as candidates for political offices, says:

While we have always deprecated the appointment or removal of judges on political grounds, or any connection of the judiciary with politics, we see no impropriety in a judge accepting the nomination to any office, provided he has the good taste to resign his judgeship immediately. If a judge finds politics more congenial than jurisprudence, let him, by all means, leave the bench. There are plenty of competent men of fine judicial minds who are content to remain upon the bench, and who have no fervant political ambition. To these the judicial offices belong by the highest right. The bench is of very little use to a judge in furthering his political schemes. If he has no other qualifications beside his judicial capacity, he will seldom be thought of for political office. But if a man is found to be qualified as well (or better) for a senator or governor as for a judge, there is no good reason why he should not be transferred from the bench to the senatorial or gubernatorial chair. Still it would not be without some advantages to so amend our constitutions as to make judges ineligible to political offices during their terms. It would perhaps add to the stability of the judiciary.

Judge Bedle, of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, who has accepted the nomination of a political party for governor, has not thought fit to resign his seat on the bench, but he had a sufficient appreciation of what became his position, to notify those who pressed his nomination, that he should under no circumstances take the stump, but should remain in retirement and allow the canvass to take care of itself.

REVISED STATUTES OF THE UNITED STATES—PUBLICATION OF THE SESSION LAWS.—The Boston Advertiser, alluding to the delay which has been occasioned in the publication of the revised statutes of the United States, and of the acts of the last session of Congress, makes the following judicious suggestions:

We suspect that the delay is due to the indexes, which, under the new system are in course of preparation in the Department of State. There is no doubt that the index to the statutes is a matter of very great importance; it is a work on which very great care should be bestowed, and from the nature of the case, cannot be hurried through without danger of errors. But for the immediate purposes of many people who desire to consult the session laws, an index is not necessary. It would seem, therefore, to be worthy of consideration, in view of the delay which this first year's experience has shown, to provide for the publication, always, of a pamphlet edition of the session laws of Congress, without an analytical index, as soon as possible after the close of the session. Perhaps the most convenient way of doing this would be in the form of an appendix to the

Congressional Record. This would be a ready means of furnishing the public with the text of the national laws; it could be printed in small type, on ordinary paper, and thus be supplied at a very low price; and its early appearance would diminish the impatience with which the publication of the more elaborate edition, accompanied by the index, would be awaited. A pamphlet edition of this sort, suited for wide distribution would, moreover, remove the last excuse for the publication of the laws of the United States in newspapers of the various states, which, as it has heretofore been done, has been rightly regarded as involving a wasteful expenditure of money. The publication of the laws from time to time, during the session at which they are passed, or immediately after its adjournment, is of great convenience to the public. But a newspaper publication, many months afterwards, serves no useful purpose; and as a means of distributing government money to needy partisan journals, it is contemptible, by reason of the small amount which can fall to the share of each newspaper, inadequate, indeed, as compensation for the service actually performed.

PRESUMPTIONS IN SUPPORT OF JUDGMENTS.—We publish elsewhere a very able and elaborate opinion of Mr. Justice Field, sitting in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, on the extent and limitations of the presumptions of law which attend the acts of courts of general jurisdiction. The case was originally tried before Mr. Circuit Judge Sawyer, and will be found reported, together with an elaborate opinion, in 1 Sawyer C. C., 309–343. The judgment of the circuit court was recently reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Field delivering the opinion. 18 Wallace, 350. The case is now finally disposed of by the same learned justice at circuit, in the opinion which we elsewhere publish. The questions involved in this case are undoubtedly of much importance, and those having occasion to investigate them will derive much assistance from the study of this concluding opinion.

We cannot here avoid calling attention to the admirable manner in which the question was put by Mr. Galpin in his succint argument before the Supreme Court of the United States, against the validity of the judgment assailed. 18 Wallace, 356–360. In the following sentences he resolves the opposite view of the case into complete nonsense: "There is no presumption of law, from the existence of a judgment, that process was served, because no presumption can arise except in favor of a valid record; and there is no proof that the papers are a valid record, unless they contain proof of service. Otherwise a record possibly invalid proves service, and the service thus presumed proves the record." "This," as was said by Mr. Justice Marcy, in Starbuck v. Murray, 5 Wend. 358, "is reasoning in a circle. The appearance makes the record uncontrollable verity, and the record makes the appearance an unimpeachable fact."

FEMALE LAWYERS.—Miss Goodell, the lady lawyer of Janesville, Wisconsin, cannot complain of the manner in which she has been advertised by the law journals, if that will procure her clients with retainers. The Chicago Legal News chronicled her advent to the bar, and made it the occasion of paying her a handsome compliment. When she won her maiden case, an action under the Wisconsin liquor law, the same paper joyfully chronicled her success, and we all rejoiced at it. The English and Irish law journals echoed our joy on the other side of the Atlantic. And now the Scottish Law Magazine has caught the echo, and the fame of Miss Goodell (and of Mrs. Bradwell, too,) resounds from the Frith of Forth to the castle of Inverness. It says:

"Many of the periodicals have been making merry over the fact that Miss Goodell, of Janesville, Wisconsin, has been admitted as a member of the bar. We do not see anything to make merry about Miss Goodell going into the profession. We have no doubt that good'll come out of it. If it is true that in one of the western states, one member of the bar who differed with another fired at him in court, and the judge was compelled to remark that if this kind thing went on much longer he was afraid he would have to commit somebody for contempt of court, we fancy that the admission of ladies to the bar of these states will have a beneficial effect by improving the tone of feeling and increasing the amenity of manners. The first intimation we saw of Miss Goodell's admission was in the Chicago Legal News, a legal periodical which is edited by a lady, Mrs. Myra Bradwell, and very well she does it, too. Another lady, connected with the same periodical, was not long since appointed assistant clerk in the state legislature of Illinois. In this country the success of female doctors has not been such a succes d'estime as to induce other ladies to attempt becoming female jurists. There may, however, come a time when (to quote the rhymes of one who evidently aspires to both the poetical and the prophetical qualities of the vates)—

> '" Ladies fair, in wig and gown,
> With stately step strut up and down,
> The noblest hall in this old town,
> With their attendant chivalry.
> And female advocates, I assure ye,
> Shall tickle the fancies of the jury,
> And put crown counsel in a fury,
> And cause a dreadful rivalry."'

But seriously, is not this a pretty small thing to make such a flutter about? If any woman of good moral character and qualified by the requisite study, desires to attempt to make a livelihood at the practice of the law, where is the man that is ungenerous enough to object? We may be divided in opinion as to whether that is her proper place, and as to whether she will succeed; but if that is not her proper place, a few failures on the part of those who attempt to succeed in it will put an end to the whole matter. We think that, in some respects, mankind and womankind are governed too much; that there is too much repression on the part of those who govern against those who are governed. If any woman thinks she can succeed at law, medicine or divinity, we believe in giving her the fullest liberty to attempt it. Whether that is her proper place is her business, and not ours. We are glad that Mrs. Bradwell has shown that she can edit a good law journal, and make money out of it, too, notwithstanding she was refused a license to practice law by the supreme court of her state. We are also glad that Miss Goodell has succeeded in winning her first case. In taking up the cause of woman against the groggeries, she has made such a beginning as becomes her position; and although we are not prepared to advocate sumptuary laws at this time, yet we should not shed tears if she should succeed in suppressing every rum hole in Wisconsin.

The Jury System.

The London Daily News makes the following observations on the English jury system:

The injustice and inequality of the system seem to us the worst thing that can be said against it. But it is also the defect which seems to occupy least of the attention of our reformers. The exemption of persons over sixty years of age is not nearly so useful a provision as would be some system of exemption for persons who could show that the task of serving as jurors would press on them with undue and special severity. Indeed the exemption for persons over sixty years of age is now practically an absurdity. Life has been greatly extending itself in England during our modern generations; and not merely life, but the period of full mental and bodily activity. No healthy man has in our days any notion of giving up active occupation merely because he is sixty years old. There is growing up, too, in the public mind the idea that a juror ought to be selected with some regard for his supposed qualification to discharge his duties. The old hap-hazard system of throwing out the judicial drag net, and hauling in an indiscriminate lot, does not seem likely to stand the test of many succeeding generations. The community contains a large proportion of persons more or less unoccupied, who are eminently fitted to perform the juror's work, and who would be quite willing to undertake the duties, if these might be accepted without an unseasonable sacrifice of personal interest to the public welfare. A good deal has been said now and then, with more or less irrelevant and inappropriate allusion to examples from classic history, about the danger of creating a "class" of jurymen. But making the most liberal allowance for the measure in which the practical may fall short of the theoretical, we cannot believe that there is anything very impracticable about the doctrine which insists that a stupid man, discharging a public duty at a heavy personal sacrifice, is not likely to prove so useful as an intelligent person willingly accepting the office.

The above is but a single instance of numerous expressions of the lay press, both of England and the United States, which indicate a dissatisfaction with the jury system as it has been developed and handed down to us by the sages of the common law. The feeling does not appear to take shape in favor of abolishing juries altogether, but rather in favor of reforming the jury system so as to secure—(1) a more intelligent class of jurors, and (2) a more general exemption from jury service of certain classes of business men, on whom such service entails great loss. We shall not attempt a discussion of the question at present, but will simply say that we do not see a way out of the difficulty in the plan proposed by the above writer. We think his suggestions, if carried out, would develop a class of professional jurors, and would remit the trial of issues of fact to the idle and vagabond elements of society; for if intelligence were the only qualification, enough intelligent men could be gathered together from these elements to perform the whole jury service of the country. Every large city has its swarms of intelligent vagabonds who would delight to be permitted to earn a subsistance by serving on juries, rather than be obliged to filch it from the tables of free-lunch saloons. But we should think it more worthy of consideration, whether the number of causes in which juries are impannelled might not be greatly reduced, with advantage to the administration of justice. We should think it more worthy of consideration whether, in all demands arising ex contractu, juries might not be dispensed with altogether. It is true that under the constitution of the United States, juries cannot be denied in actions at common law when the amount in controversy exceeds twenty dollars; but this is one of the amendments which applies only to the federal judiciary. Barron v. Mayor of Baltimore, 7 Peters, 243; Bonaparte v. Camden and Amboy Railroad Co., Bald. 220; Livingston v. Moore, 7 Pet. 551; Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 434; James v. Com., 12 Sergt. & R. 221; Barker v. People, 3 Cowen, 686.

There is nothing in the national constitution which prevents the states from abolishing trial by jury altogether in their own courts. There certainly seems to be no reason, founded in public policy or otherwise, why the solving of questions arising out of contracts and complicated business and commercial transactions should require the aid of twelve men, inexperienced in the sifting of evidence, and in the determination of such questions, when the judge is constantly entrusted with the determination of similar questions, without a jury, when sitting in equity, and society does not seem to suffer from it. Would it not, then, be worth considering whether controversies of this character ought not to be determined by the judge as of course, both as to fact and law; and whether, where a jury is demanded in such cases, the party demanding it ought not to pay the cost thereby entailed, instead of such cost being borne by the public?

The Louisiana Case — Views of Hon. Reverdy Johnson.

Hon. Reverdy Johnson has, at the solicitation of Mr. Bennett, proprietor of the New York Hearld, written a letter to that journal, giving his views upon the legal questions involved in the Louisiana case. He takes the following positions: 1. That the President committed an error in recognizing Kellogg as the legitimate governor. 2. But notwithstanding this fact, the people of Louisiana had no right, by force of arms, to overthrow the government of Kellogg and to install the rightful governmet. 3. That the people of Louisiana having done so, it was the duty of the President to interfere with the power at his command, and to resist Kellogg and the government of which he was the head. These three propositions are not in Mr. Johnson's own language, but they embrace succint statements of the views he attempts to enforce.

Whilst we cordially sympathize with the general spirit of this letter, we cannot understand any process of reasoning by which the two latter of these propositions can be reconciled with the first. Assuming, as Mr. Johnson does, that the President's recognition of Kellogg's government was based alone on Judge Durell's celebrated order, and not upon the decision of a duly constituted state board of canvassers declaring Kellogg elected, then nothing is clearer than that it was erroneous. No respectable lawyer, so far as we know, doubts what Mr. Johnson asserts, that Judge Durell's order involved a clear invasion on the part of the judiciary of the political power of the government, and was wholly extra-judicial and void. The Dorr Rebellion case, Luther v. Borden, 7 Howard, 1, is believed to be decisive of this question. Nothing is more familiar to lawyers than the principle that a judgment of a court having no jurisdiction is a mere nullity —nothing—and binds no one, but that, on the contrary, it is the duty of every one to disregard it, and that he who acts in obedience to process emanating from it does so at his peril. We fully agree with Mr. Johnson's views on this branch of the case, where he says:

In the same case (Luther v. Borden) it was decided that when the President is called upon to protect a state against domestic violence, in the manner provided for by the fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution, he is compelled to determine whether the governor or the legislature of the state making the call is or is not legitimate, and his determination is conclusive. * * * Judge Durell had no authority whatever to pass upon the question whether Kellogg had been duly elected governor. That was a question which, when properly brought before the President, he was to determine for himself. The action of the judge possessed for him, nor for anybody else, no authority whatever. Consequently the President, when he recognized Kellogg, as he is understood to have done, exclusively upon the ground of that action, fell into an error. He abandoned—undesignedly, no doubt—the duty which the constitution devolved upon him, and sought authority for what he did under a judgment of a United States judge, which, as to him, was entirely void.

So far, Mr. Johnson's positions are clear, and it would seem, incapable of being overthrown. But we cannot understand upon what ground he rests the conclusion that the President's recognition of Kellogg is final and irrevocable except by Congress. This conclusion Mr. Johnson states in the following words, the italics being ours:

But the President having recognised Kellogg, whether upon sufficient evidence on not, that recognition was at once absolute and final. The people of the state, consequently, however unjust and injurious to them may have been the decision, possessed no right to subvert the government so recognized by force of arms, except as such right was a revolutionary one. A right of revolution can never be supposed to exist under an established government. Such a right, indeed, supposes no existing legal authority, but asserts itself upon natural and elementary principles, such as are stated in our Declaration of Independence. But the states of this Union, however sovereign they are in many respects, are not wholly so. Each state is bound to the other states and to the United States, and the obligation is such that a right by force to change her form of government is not possessed by her, as its exercise might interfere with the relation that she bears to her sister states and to the paramount authority of the United States. * * * Notwithstanding all the sad consequences of the existence of the Kellogg government, the sufferers cannot legally find redress in violence. They must await the deliberation of Congress and the President, and must hope (I trust not in vain) that they will, at an early day, give them relief.

The President having recognized Kellogg, and that recognition never having been reversed by Congress, what is his duty in the existing emergency? That he cannot permit a state government to be subverted by domestic violence, without palpable dereliction of duty, is clear. When called upon in proper form to put it down, the constitution gives him no option in the matter. He is bound by its very words to bring it to a termination, and to restore the government atrempted to be overthrown. Kellogg's government, from the time it was recognized by the President to the occurrence of the late violence, was the only government known to the state. Every department—legislative, executive and judicial—existed under its authority. The President, therefore, is imperatively called upon to protect it and to reinstate it as it was before the violence took place, if he can. His recognition of it having been acted upon as conclusive of its legitimate existence, he has now no right to withdraw it. His decision is as binding upon him as it was upon the state. His jurisdiction over the subject was exhausted by its first exercise, and his subsequent conduct is to be governed by the same considerations which would control it if the legality of that government had never been called into doubt. What he is doing now, in my opinion, is what he is bound to do. An admission of a right to resort to violence to put down an existing government might, by its example, often lead to anarchy in every state—a condition of things more fatal to a people than any abuse of the elective franchise or governmental power.

We can well understand that, in the absence of any action on the part of Congress, it was the duty of the President to recognize one or the other of the contending parties as the rightful government of Louisiana, and to support with the military and naval power of the United States the government so recognized when properly called upon so to do. We can also understand that, the President having acted in the premises, his action, until reversed by Congress, is final, and concludes all other departments of the government, and all other persons; and that the people of Louisiana themselves have no right to resist it, except the right of revolution. But we cannot understand how it concludes the President himself. We cannot understand what there is in the nature of the case that prevents the President from undoing his own error. If the President, in the exercise of his political functions, to-day recognizes the government of Marshal Seranno as the legitimate government of Spain, no one can dispute that he may to-morrow withdraw that recognition, and recognize Don Carlos. If a court of justice, upon the trial of a contested election, install A. in the office of sheriff of a county, when in fact B. was duly elected, it may unquestionably grant a new trial, and upon a re-examination of the case, oust A. and install B. Is the President of the United States, in a juncture which involves the safety of our institutions, the only person who is incapable of undoing his own errors? If, by reason of acting on the judgment of a court which has no jurisdiction, he installs in office a usurper as governor of a state, is he, on discovering his error, estopped from undoing it — from deposing the usurper and permitting the installment of the rightful government? Whilst the President, in the recent juncture, was placed in a position of grave embarrassment, and whilst we admit that in view of the failure of Congress to act, his action was entirely consistent, we cannot perceive anything in the nature of the case which obliged, or which still obliges him, to support Kellogg, if, in fact, McEnery is the duly elected governor.

Railway Negligence — Contributory Negligence — Passenger with Arm out of Window.

The case of Pittsburgh & Connellsville Railroad Co. v. Andrews, decided by the Court of Appeals of Maryland, and reported in 13 Am. Law Reg., N. S., 566, is a valuable contribution to a class of cases which pass upon the question whether a railway company is liable to pay damages, where a passenger is injured by reason of his elbow being protruded from the car window, and coming in contact with some external object while the train is in rapid motion. The facts of the case were that the plaintiff purchased a ticket from McKeesport to Cumberland, and when injured was sitting in the second car from the engine. The train left Connellsville between ten and eleven o'clock at night, and when about half a mile from that station, while going at less than half speed, struck a freight-car which was left standing on a siding, in a position so near to the switch as not to permit the passage of the train without striking it. The locomotive struck the end of the freight-car, knocked it aside, and the train passed without any other collision, except a slight scratch to the sleeping-car, which was about nine inches wider than the others. No one was hurt except the plaintiff, whose right arm was broken in several places and permanently injured. The car in which he was riding did not come in contact with the freight-car, and it was admitted his arm at the time was out of the window. He was a man of mature years, and he would have received no injury if his arm had not been in this position. The defendant insisted that the jury should have been instructed that if they found the accident occurred as stated by the witnesses for the defence, then there was such want of ordinary care and prudence on the part of the plaintiff, directly contributing to the accident as would prevent him from recovering damages in the suit. This instruction the court below refused to give, and this refusal is held to have been error.

This case may therefore be quoted as deciding the principle that "if a sane person of mature years, while a passenger in a railroad car, without any controlling or justifying necessity or cause for so doing, voluntarily or inattentively protrudes his elbow or arm from the window, and it is injured by coming in contact with any external obstacle or force, it is such an act of contributory negligence on his part as will prevent a recovery, and that it is the duty of the court so to instruct the jury, as matter of law, notwithstanding the negligence of the company in permitting the obstacle to be placed too near the track of the passing train."

This principle is supported by the following cases: Todd v. Old Colony & Fall River Railroad Co., 3 Allen, 18; Pittsburgh & Connellsville Railroad Co. v. McClurg, 56 Penn. State, 294; S. C., 7 Am. Law Reg. N. S., 277; Indianapolis & Cincinnati Railroad Co. v. Rutherford, 29 Ind. 82; S. C. 7 Am. Law Reg. N. S., 476; Louisville v. Nashville Railroad Co. v. Sickings, 5 Bush, 1. The Court of Appeals of New York are supposed to have assented to the same principle in Holbrook v. Utica & Schenectady Railroad Co., 12 New York, 236.

On the other hand, a contrary rule has been asserted in

New Jersey Railroad Co. v. Kennard, 21 Pa. St., 203; in Spencer v. Milwaukee & Prairie du Chien Railroad Co., 17 Wis. 487; and in Chicago & Alton Railroad Co. v. Pondrom, 51 Ill. 333. The first of these cases was a decision by Chief Justice GIBSON at nisi prius, and was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in a per curiam opinion, but was subsequently overruled by the same Court in Pittsburgh & McConnellsville Railroad Co. v. McClurg, supra. And the Illinois case seems to proceed upon the doctrine of comparative negligence, which means that the negligence of the plaintiff and defendant respectively are to be compared, and that if the negligence of the former is but slight, while that of the latter is gross, the former may recover. This doctrine the Maryland court repudiate.

We confess to a predilection in favor of the Illinois doctrine of comparative negligence; but, assuming that it is within the province of the judge in all cases, to give the jury conclusive instructions as to whether certain admitted facts do or do not constitute negligence, we should prefer to rest our dissent from the doctrine of the Eastern courts, upon the assertion that for a passenger in a railway coach, to rest his arm in the window is not negligence at all, or at least, that it is negligence of so slight a degree that the law ought not to take notice of it. Because, leaving out the question of skill, which does not arise in a case of this kind, negligence consists in the doing or omitting of that which a man of reasonable prudence would not do or omit. Kernbacker v. Railroad Co., 3 Ohio State, 176; Tonawanda R. R. Co. v. Munger, 5 Denio, 255; Blyte v. Birmingham Water Co., 11 Exch. 781. But any person entering a railway passenger coach in warm weather when the windows are up, will observe that it is the constant and ordinary habit of passengers of all classes and of all apparent degrees of intelligence, to rest their elbows in the windows. Is a man to be held wanting in the prudence of a reasonable man, when he does no more than is commonly done by the human species in like circumstances? It therefore seems to us that if any conclusive instruction is proper in such a case, it should be that for a passenger to rest his elbow in the window of the coach, although it protrude slightly beyond the outer plane thereof, is not negligence per se.

Again, the windows of passenger coaches on American railways are ordinarily constructed with the sill but a few inches below the shoulder of the passenger who sits in the adjoining seat. This sill is flat and five or six inches wide. It could not be constructed so as to afford a more convenient and easy resting-place for the arm of the passenger, as he leans against the side of the car. By so constructing it, and leaving it open, when a single rod or wire whould keep the passenger's arm out of it, the railway company impliedly invites the passenger to rest his arm there, and impliedly promises him that no object shall be permitted to remain so near the track as to injure his arm, when naturally resting in that position. Shall it be tolerated, then, that one man may invite another into a pit-fall, and then escape responsibility on the ground that the injury would not have happened, of his victim been more circumspect and less confiding? The reasoning of Chief Justice GIBSON in New Jersey Railroad Co. v. Kennard, supra, appears to us more forcible and conclusive than any argument we have seen adduced in support of the contrary principle. He said to the jury:

A carrier of either goods or passengers is bound to provide a carriage or vehicle perfect in all its parts, in default of which he becomes responsible for any loss or injury that may be suffered, provided it happen without negligence or misconduct on the part of the party injured. A carrier of passengers is bound to omit no precaution that may conduce to their safety. He is bound to guard beforehand against every apparent danger that may beset them. The dangers incident to travelling in railway cars are few compared with those incident to other modes of travel; but among the most prominent of them is risk of injury to limbs stuck out of the windows where the cars are not so constructed as to prevent it. Any one who has travelled by railway must have observed that even the most careful passengers forget the risk, and unconsciously suffer their elbows to slip out beyond the window-sill. What can the carrier do to prevent this?

No more is required than a few metallic rods set in the window perpendicularly or horizontally, or a netting of wirework, or even wooden slats. None of these would materially impede the circulation of air or abridge the comfort of the passengers, while it would make their safety sure. A car without any of these appliances is, to coin a phrase, not roadworthy, and a carrier is responsible for any loss that may happen from that cause alone. It is a notorious custom in railway cars, and it is proved to be so by the evidence in the cause, for passengers next to the windows to rest their elbows on the sills of them, and carriers are bound to take notice of the customs and habitudes of railway passengers, and to provide for them. If a passenger, therefore, sits and rides in a car, as others generally do, and receives injury from an imperfect construction of it, the carrier is liable for it.

But it seems to us that the radical mischief consists in the fact that courts presume to instruct juries that a given state of facts do or do not constitute negligence. We are well aware that this practice is so thoroughly established, and so well grounded in authority, that it seems presumption to assail it, but we cannot avoid thinking that it involves, on the part of the judge, a clear invasion of the province of the jury. The point which strikes us is that twelve men of sense, versed in the affairs of life, are better qualified than one man of theoretical learning, to say whether a given act or omission involves reasonable care, reasonable skill, or reasonable diligence. We could illustrate this question in various ways. Suppose, for instance, that a vessel runs upon a bar and founders at sea. Suppose that none of the facts attending the disaster are controverted—the rate of speed, the time of day or night, the direction in which the vessel was heading, etc.—would not a jury of men experienced in navigation be more competent to decide whether reasonable care was exercised, under the circumstances, than any admiralty judge? Again, in the precise case we are considering, is there anything that renders a single lawyer more competent than twelve experienced laymen to decide whether the riding with one's elbow out of the window of a passenger car involves a want of reasonable care? Is there anything in his legal learning that gives him a superior qualification for determining how reasonable men generally provide for their personal safety? Is he so deeply versed in ordinary human affairs—does he travel so much—is his observation so acute—does he have so much leisure to generalize his knowledge—that his judgment on a question of ordinary experience should be better than that of twelve other men?

We can well understand how a single judge should be better fitted than twelve jurors to weigh conflicting testimony. Scarcely a day of his professional life has elapsed wherein he has not been engaged in examining witnesses, penetrating disguises, detecting falsehoods, and exposing shams. This has been the business of his life; it is his occupation, his art. He is as much better qualified than a jury of laymen to weigh conflicting testimony and declare the result, as a single seaman is better qualified to direct the navigation of a vessel than a committee of twelve landsmen. And yet no judge ever dreams of arrogating to himself this function. There is, then, in what we are considering, this striking anomaly: that while a judge never arrogates to himself a function of a jury which he is far better qualified to discharge than they, yet he constantly withdraws from them a function which they are better qualified to discharge than he.

Presumptions of Law in Favor of the Acts of Courts of General Jurisdiction—Their Extent and Limitations.

[S. C., 1 Sawyer C. C., 309; 18 Wall. 350.]

Circuit Court of the United States, District of California, August 31, 1874.

Before Hon. STEPHEN J. FIELD, one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

1. Collateral Attack of Judgments.—The expression, "collateral attack," applied to judgments, means the presentation of grounds of invalidity other than those which have been established by the prosecution of a writ of error or an appeal, or other direct proceeding to vacate the judgment. Thus, where the judgment of a superior court, under execution, emanating from which title to land had been acquired, was reversed on appeal, it was not a collateral attack upon such judgment to urge against its validity the judgment of the appellate court.

2. Whether the Rulings of the State Courts upon a Question of Jurisdiction Conclude the Federal Courts.—Where the supreme court of a state lays down rules as to the presumptions which attend the acts of the superior courts of such state, its adjudication of the question stands, like the ruling of any other court, entitled to respect and consideration for the learning and ability of its members, but possessing no obligatory force upon the federal courts. Such a ruling, except so far as it expounds the state statute, relates to matters of general law, and not to questions of a local character, peculiar only to the state.

3. The Relation of the Federal Courts to the State Courts.—Whilst the Courts of the United States are not foreign courts in their relation to the state courts, they are courts of different sovereignty, exercising a distinct and independent jurisdiction, and are bound to give to the judgments of the state courts only the same faith and credit which the courts of another state are bound to give to them.

4. Right of the Federal Courts to Enquire into the Jurisdiction of the State Courts.—Neither the constitutional requirement (, article 4, § 1), providing that "full faith and credit shall be given to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state," nor the act of Congress providing for the mode of authenticating such acts, records and proceedings (May 26, 1790), and declaring that when thus authenticated, they shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States, as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from which the records are or shall be taken," precludes an enquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment was given, or the right of the state to exercise authority over the parties, or the subject-matter of the judgment. And, although the act of 1790 includes the federal courts, these courts have the same power to make such enquiries as do the state courts.

5. Same.—A circuit court of the United States, sitting within a state, has the same power to examine into the jurisdiction of one of the courts of such state, as has a circuit court of the United States sitting within another state. The relation of the federal courts to the state courts is the same, whether sitting within or without the state.

6. Collateral Attack of Judgments—Exceptions to the General Rule.—The principle that when a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is produced in evidence, it can only be collaterally attacked for matters apparent upon its record, and that, in the absence of such matters, the jurisdiction of the court must be conclusively presumed, is subject to qualifications and exceptions which arise where the proceedings or the parties against whom they are taken are without the ordinary jurisdiction of the court, and can only be brought within it by pursuing special statutory provisions.

7. ———. ———. The Correct Principle is that there is no presumption in favor of the judgments of courts of general jurisdiction, except as to matters and persons falling within the scope of that general jurisdiction When the proceeding is special and outside of that general scope, either as to subjects or persons, the presumption ceases, and the record must show a compliance with the special authority by which the extraordinary jurisdiction is exercised.

8. Service of Summons by Publication—The California Statute relating to service of summons by publication, construed.

9. What Constitutes Record or Judgment Roll—Order of Publication—Case Overruled.—The California statute, properly construed, requires full proof of the jurisdictional facts to be incorporated into the judgment roll. It follows that where a suit has been brought against a non-resident by publication of the summons, the judgment roll must exhibit the order for publication granted by the court or judge under the statute: denying on this point Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391.

10. Same—What may be Looked to on Collateral Attack.—But if the foregoing proposition be not true—if the order of publication constitute no part of the judgment roll, then, in a collateral attack of the judgment, the remaining portions of the record of the proceedings would be of equal verity, and could be equally relied on, and the enquiry would not be confined to the judgment roll.

11. Construction of Statutes Granting Service by Publication.—Statutes permitting constructive service by publication in a personal action, in lieu of personal service, are to be strictly pursued.

12. Suits in Rem classified, and their nature discussed. Such suits are supported upon the theory that, as all property is supposed to be in possession of its owner, a seizure of property is notice to him.

13. Same—Jurisdiction—Seizure of Property—Publication.—But in actions against non-resident defendants, unless property is taken into custody at the outset of the proceeding, or unless publication of summons is made as provided by the statute, the court acquires no jurisdiction; and a purchaser under an execution issued in pursuance of such a judgment gets no title.

14. Guardian ad Litem—California Statute.—Under the California statute a court cannot appoint a guardian ad litem for an infant, unless the infant has been previously served with process.

Mr. Justice FIELD:—The material questions presented for consideration in this case have already been determined by the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is unnecessary, therefore, to repeat at large the facts of the case; they are given in the report of the decision in 18 Wallace. It will be sufficient to state here its general features. The action is ejectment for the possession of certain real property situated within the City of San Francisco, both parties deraigning title from the same source, Franklin C. Gray, deceased, who died in the City of New York in July, 1853, intestate, seized of the premises in controversy. The plaintiff claims through conveyances executed by direction of the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, which administered upon the estate of the deceased. The defendant claims under a purchaser at a commissioner's sale, had under a decree of a district court of the state, having jurisdiction in that city and county, rendered in a suit brought to settle the affairs of alleged co-partnerships between the deceased and others. The case turns upon the validity of this decree and the commissioner's sale had under it.

The suit in which that decree was rendered was one into which two suits, brought by different parties, had been consolidated. One of them was brought in 1854, by William H. Gray, a brother of the deceased; the other was brought in 1855 by Cornelius J. Eaton, who had been at one time a clerk of the deceased. Each of these complainants alleged a separate, distinct and dormant co-partnership between himself and the deceased, which embraced the commercial business in which the latter was engaged and all his real estate transactions. Gray alleged that his interest in the business and property of the co-partnership formed between him and the deceased was one-third. Eaton claimed that his interest in the business and property of the co-partnership formed with him was one-fourth. Each of these complainants, alleging an universal and dormant co-partnership between himself and the deceased, denied, one of them under oath, any co-partnership of the deceased with the other. Subsequently, however, they consented to a consolidation of their suits; and four days afterwards a decree was entered, and it would seem from the certificate of the judge appended to the decree that it was by consent of the parties, adjudging that each had been a co-partner with the deceased as alleged by him, and that both of these co-partnerships, dormant and unknown to each other as they were, embraced all the property and all the business of the deceased.

By the decree a reference was ordered to a commissioner to take an account of the business, profits and property of the two co-partnerships, with directions, upon the confirmation of his report, to sell all the property, real and personal, of both co-partnerships, and to execute proper conveyances to the purchasers. At the sale which subsequently took place, one of the attorneys of the complainant, Gray, became a purchaser of the premises in controversy. He afterwards conveyed an undivided half to his law partner, and devised the other undivided half to the defendant. His law partner some years later transferred his interest also to the defendant.

The deceased, Franklin C. Gray, left surviving him a widow,

Matilda C. Gray, of whom a posthumous child was born in December following, named Franklina C. Gray. By the law of California the estate of the deceased vested in the widow and child in equal shares; and they both were made parties to the suits of Gray and Eaton; in the first suit the child being made a party by a supplemental bill. Both were non-residents of the state of California and residents of the state of New York; and their absence from this state and residence in New York were averred in the pleadings. Constructive service upon them, by publication under the statute, was therefore attempted. The widow appeared; and upon representation that service had been made upon the infant, a guardian ad litem, was appointed for her, and he consented to the consolidation of the two suits, and, it would seem, to the decree rendered.

Subsequently, upon appeal to the supreme court of the state, the decree of the district court in the consolidated suit was reversed, on the ground that no sufficient service of summons had been made upon the infant Franklina in the case brought by Eaton; and that, until such service, no guardian ad litem could be appointed for her; and on the additional ground that the evidence presented had not established a co-partnership between William H. Gray and the deceased. The case was accordingly remanded to the district court; and subsequently the two suits, after being on the calendar for trial for nearly a year, were dismissed. The plaintiff acquired his interest and brought the present action after this dismissal.

When the case was originally here, the circuit court decided that the record in the suits of Gray and Eaton, in the district court, did not show that due service of summons by publication had not been made upon the infant Franklina, and as the district court was a superior court of general jurisdiction, it must be presumed to have had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties in those suits; and that, in consequence, the sale and conveyance under the decree, notwithstanding its subsequent reversal on the grounds stated, passed a good title to the purchaser;—the court holding that where a record of a judgment of a superior court of general jurisdiction was assailed collaterally, it was not enough that the record did not affirmatively show jurisdiction, but that it must affirmatively show that the court did not have jurisdiction, or its judgment would be valid until reversed on appeal or vacated in some direct proceeding taken for that purpose. And so the court said that "at the time of the sale, a parchaser was entitled to rely upon the validity of the decree (in the consolidated suit), unless it affirmatively appeared on the face of the record that the court had no jurisdiction of the infant."

But the Supreme Court of the United States took a different view of the case, and held that the adjudication of the supreme court of the state, that no sufficient service of summons was ever made upon the infant Franklina, and that until such service no guardian ad litem could be appointed for her, was an adjudication that the jurisdiction of the district court over her had never attached, and that this adjudication was conclusive and binding upon the circuit court, and every other court, when brought before it for consideration. Into its soundness the circuit court could not look; for it possessed no revisory power over the decisions of the supreme court of the state. The adjudication constituted the law of that case, and settled, for all possible controversies, the character of the decree of the district court. Rendered without jurisdiction, that decree was always void, so far as it affected the rights of the infant Franklina, and unavailing to support any proceedings under it affecting her title.

But the Supreme Court of the United States in its decision went still further, and held that the rule stated by the circuit court, as to the presumptions which the law implies in support of the judgments of superior courts of general jurisdiction, was subject to many exceptions and qualifications and had no application to the case at bar; that such presumptions were limited to jurisdiction over persons within the territorial limits of the courts, persons who could be reached by their process, and also over proceedings which were in accordance with the course of the common law. In these latter particulars, the decision was in affirmation of doctrines asserted by the circuit court in an elaborate and carefully considered opinion, delivered in 1865, in the case of Gray v. Larrimore, which grew out of the sale under the same decree of the district court which is now before us. The doctrines there asserted were followed in the subsequent case of Gray v. Murphy, and, until the decision of this case by the present circuit judge, were not regarded as open to contestation in the circuit court. In this case they were overruled by him upon the supposed obligation of the court to follow a decision of the supreme court of the state in Hahn v. Kelly, rendered in 1868, 34 Cal. 391. And to that case, frequent reference has been made by counsel on the present trial, and some of its positions have been pressed with great earnestness, as though they were decisive of the points now under consideration. That case was cited to the Supreme Court of the United States. Extracts from the opinion in the case constituted the principal argument before that court of one of the counsel of the defendants; and if its positions were not expressly mentioned in the opinion of that court, it was not because they had not been carefully considered.

That case was brought to quiet the title to a tract of land in Alameda county, and to restrain its sale. The plaintiff asserted title to the premises by virtue of a sale under a judgment recovered for the deficiency remaining of a mortgage debt, after application of the proceeds received upon a sale of the property mortgaged. The suit in which the mortgage was foreclosed and judgment for the deficiency rendered, was prosecuted without personal service upon the defendant, upon publication of summons; and the validity of the judgment was assailed upon the alleged ground that the attempted service of the summons by publication was defective and void. The decree, however, recited that it appeared to the court that the summons and complaint had been "duly served on the defendants according to law and the order of the judge of the court," and the supreme court of the state held that this recital was a direct adjudication upon the point, and was as conclusive upon the parties as any other fact decided, provided it did not affirmatively appear, from other portions of the record, that the recital was untrue. As there was no direct contradiction of the recital, and as no other objection than the one mentioned was taken, this ruling as to the effect of the recital disposed of the case and necessitated a reversal of the decree below. The court, however, in its opinion, did not confine its consideration to this point, but proceeded to lay down certain general rules as to the presumptions of jurisdiction attendant upon the judgments of superior courts of general jurisdiction, and to declare what constitutes the record in this state of such judgments, and the conditions upon which they may be collaterally assailed. Among other things, it is asserted in substance, and so far as anything in an opinion can be deemed an adjudication, which is not necessary to the decision, it adjudged:

1st. That a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, could not be attacked collaterally, except for matters apparent upon its record; that it was not necessary that the jurisdiction of the court should affirmatively appear upon the record, but that, in the absence from the record of matters affirmatively disclosing a want of jurisdiction, either over the subject-matter of the action or the person of the defendant, such jurisdiction would be conclusively presumed; and that this conclusive presumption prevailed in all cases without reference to the character of the proceedings, or the residence of the parties against whom they were taken;

2d. That in this state such record of the court consists only of the papers and proceedings which compose what is designated in the Code of Procedure as the judgment roll; and, where jurisdiction is exercised over persons without the territorial limits of the court, by constructive service upon them by publication of summons, and judgment by default is rendered upon such survice, the record need not contain certain material proceedings, without which jurisdiction cannot attach, or any recital or evidence of such proceedings, because the legislature has not directed such proceedings to be incorporated into the so-called judgment roll.

We do not regard the case at bar as one where any collateral attack is made upon a judgment of a superior court of general jurisdiction. The decree in the consolidated suit of Gray & Eaton is not here attacked collaterally in any proper meaning of that term. The adjudication of the appellate court in the same case, upon the character of that decree, is not offered by way of collateral attack; it is the exhibition of the result of a direct proceeding with reference to that decree had on appeal. When we speak of a collateral attack, we refer to the presentation of grounds of invalidity other than those which have been established by the prosecution of a writ of error, or an appeal, or some other direct proceeding, to vacate the judgment. We will nevertheless examine the position advanced by the supreme court of the state in the case named.

Before proceeding, however, to this examination, it is proper to say a few words respecting the light in which the ruling of the state court in that case is to be regarded in this court, and the right of this court to look into the jurisdiction of a state court when its judgment is produced in evidence.

In the first place, the ruling of the state court in Hahn v. Kelly, except so far as it gives a construction to the statute of the state, is not binding upon this court. In all that relates to the presumptions which attend the acts of the superior courts, and the circumstances under which they may be assailed, it stands like the ruling of any other court, entitled to the respect and consideration for the learning and ability of its members, but possessing no obligatory force. "Where private rights," says the Supreme Court of the United States in Chicago City v. Robbins (2 Black, 429), "are to be determined by the application of common law rules alone, this court (and the same is true of the circuit court), though entertaining for state tribunals the highest respect, does not feel bound by their decision." "It is undoubtedly true in general," says the same court in another case (Alcott v. Supervisors, 16 Wal. 687), "that this court does follow the decisions of the highest courts of the states, respecting local questions peculiar to themselves; or respecting the construction of their own constitutions and laws. But it must be kept in mind that it is only decisions upon local questions, those which are peculiar to the several states, or adjudications upon the meaning of the constitution or statutes of a state, which the federal courts adopt as rules for their own judgments." The ruling of the state court in Hahn v. Kelly, except so far as it gives a construction to the state statute, relates to matters of general law, and not to questions of a local character peculiar only to the state. If the ruling of the court be correct, it applies not merely to judgments of the superior courts of general jurisdiction existing in California, but to the judgments of such courts existing in all other states.

In the second place, whilst the courts of the United States are not foreign courts in their relation to the state courts, they are courts of a different sovereignty, exercising a distinct and independent jurisdiction, and are bound to give to the judgments of the state courts only the same faith and credit which the courts of another state are bound to give to them. And it is well settled, that neither the constitutional requirement providing that "full faith and credit shall be given to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state," nor the act of Congress providing for the mode of authenticating such acts, records and proceedings (May 26, 1790), and declaring that when thus authenticated they shall have such faith and credit given to them, in every court within the United States, as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from which the records are or shall be taken," precludes an enquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment was given, or the right of the state to exercise authority over the parties, or the subject-matter of the judgment. As was said in Christmas v. Russell (5 Wall., 305), the judgments of the courts of one state are not foreign judgments in another state, under the constitution and act of Congress, nor are they domestic judgments in every sense; because they are not the proper foundation of final process, except in the state where they were rendered; and they are open to enquiry as to the jurisdiction of the court and notice to the defendant.

The act of Congress goes, perhaps, further than the constitutional requirement which relates to the faith and credit to be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state, inasmuch as it declares the effect of the records and judicial proceedings of the states, when authenticated, as provided "in every court within the United States," thus making its provision applicable to the federal courts, as well as to the courts of the states. The power of Congress to prescribe the manner in which the records of the states shall be proved in the national courts, and the effect which shall be given to them, is independent of the constitutional provision. Still the law is to have the same construction in its application to the national courts as to the state courts. It leaves untouched the general principle that the jurisdiction of every court is open to enquiry, when produced in the courts of another sovereignty.

The Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, has the same authority to examine into the jurisdiction as a state court of California when tis judgment is produced, as the Circuit Court of the Unted States for the District of New York has, when the same judgment is produced before that tribunal. All the circuit courts of the United States have the same relation to the state courts; and each will take notice of, and administer in proper case the laws of the states. This court, for example, will take notice of, and, in a proper case, administer the law of New York, just as it will take notice of and administer the law of this state. In all cases the jurisdiction of a state court may be enquired into; but the enquiry can proceed no further; the jurisdiction existing, the merits of the controversy involved are not open to examination.

We recur now to the rulings in Hahn v. Kelly. The first position, that when a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is produced in evidence it can only be collaterally attacked for matters apparent upon its record, and that, in the absence of such matters, the jurisdiction of the court must be conclusively presumed, is with certain qualifications and exceptions undoubtedly correct. These qualifications and exceptions arise where the proceedings, or the parties against whom they are taken, are without the ordinary jurisdiction of the court, and can only be brought within it by pursuing special statutory provisions. As we had occasion to observe in a previous case, "all courts, even such as are designated courts of superior or general authority, are more or less limited in their jurisdiction; they are limited to a particular kind of cases such as civil or criminal; or to particular modes of administering relief, such as legal or equitable; or to transactions of a special character, such as may arise upon the high seas, or to the use of particular process in the enforcement of their judgments." Norton v. Meader. When we speak of a court of general jurisdiction in civil cases, we do not mean one which has jurisdiction over all subjects, and all persons, and of all process; but we mean one which exercises a general jurisdiction, in law or equity, according to the well established principles known to those departments of jurisprudence, over subjects and persons within certain defined territorial limits. When a judgment of such a court is produced, relating to a matter falling within the general scope of its powers, the jurisdiction of the court will be presumed, even in the absence of the formal proceedings or steps by which the jurisdiction was obtained; and such jurisdiction cannot ordinarily be assailed except on writ of error or appeal, or by some other direct proceeding. But when the judgment of such a court relates to a matter not falling within the general scope of its powers, and the authority of the court over the subject can only be exercised in a prescribed manner, not according to the course of the common law; or the judgment is against a party without the territorial limits of the court, who was not served within those limits and did not appear to the action, no such presumption of jurisdiction can arise. The judgment, being as to its subject-matter or persons out of its ordinary jurisdiction, authority for its rendition must appear upon the face of its record. In other words, there is no presumption in favor of the judgments of courts of general jurisdiction, except as to matters and persons falling within the scope of that general jurisdiction. When the proceeding is special and outside of that general scope, either as to subjects or persons, the presumption ceases, and the record must show a compliance with the special authority, by which the extraordinary jurisdiction is exercised. This doctrine is an obvious deduction from principle, and is sustained by adjudged cases almost without number in the highest courts of the several states, and in the Supreme Court of the United States. There is running all through the reports the emphatic declaration of the common law courts, that a special authority, conferred even upon a court of general jurisdiction, which is exercised in a mode different from the course of the common law, must be strictly pursued, and the record must disclose the jurisdiction of the court. On this subject the cases speak a uniform language, with scarcely dissentient voice.

The tribunals of one state have no jurisdiction, and can have none, over persons or property without its territorial limits. Their authority is necessarily circumscribed by the limits of the sovereignty creating them. Any exertion of authority beyond these limits would be deemed, as stated in D'Arcy v. Ketchum (11 How. 174), in every other forum an illegitimate assumption of power, and be resisted as mere abuse.

But over property and persons within those limits the authority of the state is supreme, except as restrained by the federal constitution. When, therefore, property thus situated is held by parties resident without the state, or absent from it, and thus beyond the reach of the process of its courts, the admitted jurisdiction of the state over the property would be defeated, if a substituted service upon the parties were not permitted. Accordingly, under special circumstances, upon the presentation of particular proofs, substituted service, in lieu of personal service, is allowed by statute in nearly all the states, so as to subject the property of a non-resident or absent party to such disposition by their tribunals as may be necessary to protect the rights of their own citizens. In this state, the statute, in terms, allows a constructive or substituted service in all cases, whether upon contract or for torts, where the person on whom the service is to be made is a non-resident of the state or is absent from it, whether the action be directed against property within the state, or merely for the recovery of a personal judgment against the defendant. But so far as the statute authorizes, upon such substituted service, a personal judgment against a non-resident, except as a means of reaching property situated at the time within the state, or affecting some interest therein, or determining the status of the plaintiff with respect to such non-resident, it cannot be sustained as a legitimate exercise of legislative power. A pure personal judgment, not used as a means of reaching property at the time in the state, or affecting some interest therein, or determining the status of the plaintiff, rendered against a non-resident of the state, not having been personally served within its limits and not appearing to the action, would not be a judicial determination of the rights of the parties, but an arbitrary declaration by the tribunals of the state as to the liability of a party over whose person and property they had no control. The validity of the statute can only be sustained by restricting its application to cases where, in connection with the process against the person, property in the state is brought under the control of the court and subjected to its judgment, or where the judgment is sought simply as a means of reaching such property or affecting some interest therein, or to cases where the action relates to the personal status of the plaintiff in the state

Aliens at peace with the United States are allowed access to the courts of the states, and unless the statute be limited in its application as stated, we must accept the conclusion that personal judgments for torts by one alien against another, neither of whom has ever been within our borders, may be recovered without personal service, by publication, and subsequently enforced against any property belonging to the defendant, that may by chance be brought into the country. It would certainly be a strange application of the statute if an inhabitant of Asia could recover in that way in our courts a personal judgment for an alleged tort committed against him in his own country by one of his countrymen.

An attachment of the property of a non-resident is allowed by the law of this state in all actions upon contracts, express or implied. This remedy, with the ordinary power of a court of equity to enforce mortgages and other liens, and to take property into its custody where there is danger of its removal beyond the state or of being wasted, and the information imparted to third parties by filing a notice of lis pendens where an interest in real property is the subject of the litigation, affords sufficient protection to citizens of the state, without the assumption of any territoral jurisdiction over non-residents. Be this as it may, any such assumption can find no support in any principle of natural justice or constitutional law.

"Where a party is within a territory," says Mr. Justice STORY in Picquet v. Swan (5 Mason, 43), "he may justly be subjected to its process, and bound personally by the judgment pronounced on such process against him. Where he is not within such territory, and is not personally subject to its laws, if on account of his supposed or actual property being within the territory, process by the local laws may by attachment go to compel his appearance, and for his default to appear, judgment may be pronounced against him, such a judgment must, upon general principles, be deemed only to bind him to the extent of such property, and cannot have the effect of a conclusive judgment in personam, for the plain reason that, except so far as the property is concerned, it is a judgment coram non judice. * * * The principles of the common law (which are never to be lost sight of in the construction of our own statutes,) proceed yet further. In general, it may be said, that they authorize no judgment against a party, until after his appearance in court. He may be taken on a capias and brought into court, or distrained by attachment and other process against his property to compel his appearance; and for non-appearance be outlawed. But still, even though a subject, and within the kingdom, the judgment against him can take place only after such appearance. So anxious was the common law to guard the rights of private persons from judgments obtained without notice and regular personal appearance in court."

"Jurisdiction is acquired," says the supreme court in Boswell's Lessee v. Otis (9 Howard, 348), "in one of two modes; first, as against the person of the defendant by the service of process; or, secondly, by a procedure against the property of the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court. In the latter case, the defendant is not personally bound by the judgment beyond the property in question. And it is immaterial whether the proceeding against the property be by attachment or a bill in chancery. It must be substantially a proceeding in rem."

A substituted service is usually made in the form of a notice published in the public journals, as in this state. "But such notice," says Cooley (p. 404), in his treatise on Constitutional Limitations, "is restricted in its legal effect, and cannot be made available for all purposes. It will enable the court to give effect to the proceeding so far as it is one in rem, but when the res is disposed of the authority of the court ceases. The statute may give it effect so far as the subject-matter of the proceeding is within the limits, and therefore under the control of the state; but the notice cannot be made to stand in the place of process, so as to subject the defendant to a valid judgment against him personally. In attachment proceedings, the published notice may be sufficient to enable the plaintiff to obtain a judgment which he can enforce by sale of the property attached, but for any other purpose such judgment would be ineffectual. The defendant could not be followed into another state or county, and there have recovery against him upon the judgment as an established demand. The fact that process was not personally served is a conclusive objection to the judgment as a personal claim, unless the defendant caused his appearance to be entered in the attachment proceedings. Where a party has property in a state, and resides elsewhere, his property is justly subject to all valid claims that may exist against him there; but beyond this, due process of law would require appearance or personal service before the defendant could be personally bound by any judgment rendered."

In Cooper v. Reynolds (10 Wall. 308), similar doctrines are laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case, the plaintiff had sued the defendants in Tennessee for false imprisonment, and upon affidavit that none of them were to be found in his county, sued out a writ of attachment against their property. Publication was ordered by the court, notifying them to appear and plead, answer or demur, or that the suit would be taken as confessed, and proceed in ex parte as to them. Publication was had, and the defendants having made default, judgment was entered against them, and the attached property was sold under it. The purchaser having been put into possession, the original owner brought ejectment for the premises. In considering the character of the attachment suit, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice MILLER, said: "Its essential purpose or nature is to establish, by the judgment of the court, a demand against the defendant, and to subject his property, lying within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, to the payment of that demand.

"But the plaintiff is met at the commencement of his proceedings by the fact that the defendant is not within that territorial jurisdiction, and cannot be served with any process by which he can be brought personally within the power of the court. For this difficulty the statute has provided a remedy. It says that, upon affidavit being made of that fact, a writ of attachment may be issued and levied on any of the defendant's property, and a publication may be made warning him to appear, and that thereafter the court may proceed in the case, whether he appears or not.

"If the defendant appears, the cause becomes mainly a suit in personam, with the added incident that the property attached remains liable, under the control of the court, to answer to any demand which may be established against the defendant by the final judgment of the court. But, if there is no appearance of the defendant, and no service of process on him, the case becomes, in its essential nature, a proceeding in rem, the only effect of which is to subject the property attached to the payment of the demand which the court may find to be due to the plaintiff.

"That such is the nature of this proceeding in this latter class of cases, is clearly evinced by two well established propositions: first, the judgment of the court, though in form a personal judgment against the defendant, has no effect beyond the property attached in that suit. No general execution can be issued for any balance unpaid after the attached property is exhausted. No suit can be maintained on such a judgment in the same court or in any other; nor can it be used as evidence in any other proceeding not affecting the attached property; nor could the costs in that proceeding be collected of defendant out of any other property than that attached in the suit. Second, the court, in such a suit, cannot proceed unless the officer finds some property of defendant on which to levy the writ of attachment. A return that none can be found, is the end of the case, and deprives the court of further jurisdiction, though the publication may have been duly made and proven in court."

The writer of the present opinion thought some of the objections taken to the preliminary proceedings in the attachment suit referred to, were well founded, and dissented from the judgment of the court; but, in the doctrine laid down in the above citation he always has concurred. It is, in our judgment, the true doctrine and the only doctrine which is consistent with any just protection to the citizens of other states. Such is the constant intercourse between citizens of different states, at the present time, that the greatest security to property would exist if purely personal judgments, obtained ex parte without personal citation, upon mere publication of notice, which, in the great majority of cases, would never be seen by the parties interested, could be made available for the seizure of property afterwards brought within the state. That law would be intolerable, if valid, which would permit citizens of another state to come into this state and recover personal judgments for all sorts of torts and contracts, upon mere service by publication against citizens of different states who have never been within the state or possessed any property therein. If such judgments could be upheld they would become the frequent instruments of fraud in the hands of the unscrupulous, and be sprung on the property of the unsuspecting defendants when the transactions giving rise to the judgments have passed from their memory, or the evidence respecting the transactions has perished. We do not think it within the competency of the legislature to invest its tribunals with authority having any such reach and force; certainly no presumption in favor of their jurisdiction can arise when a judgment of this character is produced against a non-resident who has never been within the state, and did not appear to the action. Hare & Wallace's Notes to Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 1, p. 838; Picquet v. Swan, 5 Mason, 535; Monroe v. Douglass, 4 Sand. Ch. 182.*

The second position laid down in Hahn v. Kelly, requires us to consider what papers and proceedings constitute the record of a court of general jurisdiction, which may be looked into when a judgment of that court rendered against a person without the territorial limits of the court, upon constructive service by publication, is assailed collaterally for want of jurisdiction. In that case it is held that such record consists only of the papers and proceedings which compose what is designated in the Code of Proceedure as the judgment-roll; and that it need not contain the affidavit of the party and the order of the court, without which constructive service of the summons by publication cannot be made.

The statute, authorizing constructive service by publication of summons upon non-resident and absent parties, requires certain facts to be presented by affidavit to the court in which the action is pending, or to a judge thereof, or to a county judge. If it appear upon such presentation, to the satisfaction of the court or judge, that the facts exist, an order may be made for the publication of the summons, and such order must prescribe the period and designate the paper in which the publication is to be made; and if the residence of the defendant be known, the order must also direct a

*In Oakley v. Aspinwall (4th Comstock, 520), Mr. Chief Justice BRONSON, in delivering the opinion of the Court of Appeals of New York, said: "When the courts of any state render a judgment against one who was not a citizen of that state and was not brought into court, the judgment is held absolutely void everywhere else, although it may have been expressly authorized by the legislature of the state where it was rendered. I doubt whether such a judgment is of any force in the state where it was rendered. Under our form of government it is questionable, to say the least, whether the legislature can, in any case, without an express license from the people, authorize a judgment which shall operate in personam against the defendant who neither appeared nor was in any way served with process. That state must not boast of its civilization, nor of its progress in the principles of civil liberty, where the legislature has power to provide that a man may be condemned unheard."

In Webster v. Reid (11 How. 459), it appeared that the legislature of the Territory of Iowa had directed that suit might be instituted against the owners of half-breed lands lying in Lee county in that territory, and notice be given to the owners through the Iowa Territorial Gazette. Suits having been instituted by notice in that way, and judgments recovered, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that they were nullities. "These suits," said Mr. Justice MCLEAN in delivering the opinion of the Court, "were not a proceeding in rem against the land, but were in personam against the owners of it. Whether they all resided within the territory or not, does not appear, nor is it a matter of any importance. No person is required to answer in a suit on whom process has not been served, or whose property has not been attached. In this case there was no personal notice nor an attachment or other proceeding against the land, until after the judgments. The judgments, therefore, are nullities, and did not authorize the executions on which the land was sold."

copy of the summons and complaint to be forthwith deposited in the post-office directed to him at his place of residence. The service of summons is deemed complete at the expiration of the time prescribed by the order for publication.

The statute, in the same title which treats of the manner of commencing civil actions, after stating the manner in which service shall be made in case of personal service, and in case of service by publication, provides in sections almost immediately following that, "proof of the service of summons shall be as follows: 1. If served by the sheriff, his certificate thereof. 2. If served by any other person, his affidavit thereof. 3. In case of publication, the affidavit of the printer or his foreman or principal clerk, showing the same; and on an affidavit of a deposit of a copy of the summons in the post-office, if the same has been deposited."

In another part of the same statute, in a different title and chapter, treating of a different subject, "the manner of giving and entering judgment," it is provided that immediately after entering the judgment, in case the complaint be not answered, the clerk shall attach together the summons with the affidavit or proof of service, and the complaint with a memorandum endorsed thereon, that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment; and that these papers shall constitute the judgment-roll in the case.

Now, it is evident that the language of the statute in the first title mentioned, declaring what shall be proof of service of the summons, must be limited to the action of the persons making the service or publication, of which the sections immediately preceeding in the same title speak; as if the language were as follows: "Proof of the service of summons by the sheriff or other person, or by a publisher of a newspaper, as above provided, shall be as follows." The obvious meaning intended is, that the proof of service, which the parties performing the particular duty prescribed must furnish, shall be the certificate or affidavit designated. It does not mean that such certificate or affidavit shall be all that is required on the subject of service, but only all that is required of those particular persons. Any other construction would lead to this absurd result, that an affidavit could be used to establish conclusively a fact to which it makes no reference. Publication of a summons in a newspaper is not service of the summons, nor is an affidavit of such publication proof of service. The publication to be of any avail, must be in a paper designated and for the period prescribed by the order of the court or judge. The terms of such order must therefore be connected with the affidavit, or the proof will amount to nothing. The affidavit by itself is only a portion of the proof, a solitary link in the chain required. The printer is not supposed to know anything of the order, and is not called upon even to refer to it in his affidavit.

When, therefore, the record of the judgment comes to be made up, it must necessarily include the order of the court, or it will disclose no proof of service. And when the statute requires the clerk to attach, with other papers, the proof of service, it means not merely the affidavit which the publisher may furnish as part of such proof, but the order also, without which the affidavit establishes nothing. It is in giving to the provision, declaring the proof which the officer or person making personal service, or the printer publishing the summons, shall furnish of their acts, the effect of a declaration that no other proof of the service was necessary, that error, in our judgment, was committed in Hahn v. Kelly.

That the ruling in that case left the judgment-roll a defective and imperfect record, seems to have been felt by the court, for it says: "In our judgment, it would have added to the completeness of the record to have made the proof of service by publication include also the affidavit of the party, and the order of the court directing publication to be made, for, in point of law, they constitute a part of the mode; but the legislature has not seen proper to do so, and we can no more add to their will than we can take from it."

For the reasons we have stated, we do not admit that the statute sanctions any such defective record; but, on the contrary, we are clear that, properly construed, it requires full proof of the jurisdictional facts to be incorporated into the judgment-roll.

If, however, we are mistaken, and the order, which is the foundation of and the only authority for the publication, is no part of such roll, or, if not mistaken, we are bound to accept as correct, the construction of the statute given by the state court, then enquiry into the jurisdiction of the court cannot be limited, on a collateral attack, to the contents of the roll. The remaining record of the proceedings would be of equal authority and verity, and could be equally relied upon. The record at common law, which imported absolute verity, was a history of all the acts and proceedings in the action, from its initiation to final judgment, enrolled upon parchment for a perpetual memorial and testimony. These rolls were called records of the court, and were, in the language of Blackstone, "of such high and supereminent authority that their truth was not to be called in question." A record, professedly embracing only a portion of such acts and proceedings, cannot be entitled to similar implicit credit, and cannot equally close the door against collateral attack. The use of the same designation to indicate a different collection of acts and proceedings, cannot, of course, carry with it the same import. If the legislature should declare that only that portion of the proceedings in an action which constitutes the judgment itself, should be enrolled, it would not be any less illogical to insist that to that enrollment parties should be confined when questioning the jurisdiction of the court, than it is that they shall be confined to any other defective record of the proceedings in the action.

When constructive service by publication in a personal action is authorized by statute in place of personal citation, the rule prevailing in all courts is, that the statute must be strictly pursued. We are not aware that this doctrine has been denied in any state court. It has been repeatedly asserted by the supreme court of this state in the most emphatic manner. "A contrary course," said that court in Jordan v. Giblin, in 1859, "would encourage fraud and lead to oppression." 12 Cal. 100. "A failure to carry out the rule thus prescribed," said the court, speaking through Mr. Justice SANDERSON, in Ricketson v. Richardson (26 Cal. 149), "in any particular, is fatal where it is not cured by an appearance." In Forbes v. Hyde (31 Cal.), 342, decided in 1866, the same doctrine is recognized. There the objection to the insufficiency of an affidavit made to obtain an order of publication, was allowed on a collateral attack to the judgment under which the plaintiff claimed title in ejectment. As the statute only requires certain facts to appear by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court or judge, we should be inclined, in the absence of this decision, to hold that defects in the affidavit could be taken advantage of only on appeal, and could not be urged collaterally. We cite the case, however, not only because it reiterates the rule of strict construction, but because of the special reason it gives for its enforcement in this state, in the observation that there is probably "no state in which so many have waited, and are still waiting, for their adversaries to depart in order that suit may be brought and judgment obtained against them on publication without actual notice." "It may be important," continues Mr. Justice SAWYER, in delivering the unanmous opinion of the court, "to the interests of those who suppose they have acquired rights under this class of judgments, that they should be upheld. But it is equally important that the interests of parties, who have only been constructively served with process, and who, in many instances, have had no actual notice till they have been condemned unheard, should be protected. If a judgment is void for want of jurisdiction, all those who have acquired interests under it, have done so in full view of the condition of the record; while, on the other hand, a defendant is liable to have an unjust judgment rendered against him without any knowledge of the pendency of the action till it is too late to protect himself. An appeal is no adequate remedy where a party has no notice; for the time to appeal is very brief, and may expire before actual notice is obtained. In the language of the court in Smith v. Rice (11 Mass. 512), "the very grievance complained of is, that the party had no notice of the pending of the cause, and of course no opportunity to appeal."

Now, if the rule in Hahn v. Kelly be correct, we have this singular result: that whilst the statute must be strictly followed before jurisdiction can be acquired over the person, a party against whom a judgment is rendered is precluded from examining the proceedings by which alone it can be seen whether the statute has been followed. In other words, the court says, no jurisdiction is acquired by the court if the requirements of the statute be not pursued, but the record of the proceedings taken shall always be a closed book.

If the order of the court is no part of the judgment-roll it cannot be brought before the court on appeal, unless a statement or bill of exceptions be made up; and either of these proceedings supposes the presence of the parties or counsel. If any other direct proceedings are taken they might result in vacating the judgment, but under the ruling in the case cited, the record being regular on its face, the purchaser, if a third party, would be protected, and the wronged defendant be left to the doubtful chances of recovering the value of his property by action against the plaintiff.

From the examination we have thus been able to give to the case of Hahn v. Kelly, we do not find in it sufficient reasons to depart from the old and well established rules formerly recognized in the supreme court of this state, the observance of which, as we are more and more impressed every day, is essential to the protection of the rights of all citizens, whether resident or non-resident of the state.

The proceedings for constructive service by publication, which the statute authorizes, are, as stated by Mr. Justice SANDERSON in the case of Ricketson v. Richardson, "in derogation of the common law;" that is, they are not in accordance with the course of the common law.

It was the boast of that law that it condemned no one in his person or his property without his day in court. That there must be citation before hearing, and hearing, or opportunity of being heard, before judgment, was a cardinal principle which pervaded all its judicial proceedings. And when the articles of compact contained in the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the North West Territory, declared that its inhabitants should always be entitled "to judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law," it was believed by them that they had in that guarantee the assurance of full protection to all their private rights; and that the language was not used "mainly for ornamental purposes," having a certain "rotundity of sound which is pleasing to the ear," but leaving "no definite impression upon the understanding."* Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 411. The common law recognized no such proceeding as a personal judgment without the appearance of the party, and probably in no other case than Hahn v. Kelly were proceedings to outlawry ever cited as a mode "amounting or equivalent to constructive service," by which a common law court obtained jurisdiction. "By the strict rules of the common law," says the Supreme Court of New Jersey in Hess v. Cole (3 Zab. 116), "it was necessary in every suit, not only that the defendant should be served with process, but that his appearance to the action should be effected. Every student is familiar with the cumbrous machinery and complicated process by which the courts sought to compel the appearance of the defendant. He is familiar also with the principle, that if the defendant was contumacious and refused to appear to a mere civil action, the proceedings were at an end. No judgment could be rendered. Every common law record shows upon its face that the defendant was either in custody, or was summoned or attached to answer to the action. And, however inconvenient may have been the strictness with which the principle was applied, and the extent to which it was enforced in ancient common law proceedings, the principle itself is by no means peculiar to the common law. It pervades, in fact, every code of law and every well-regulated system for the administration of justice."

The opinion in Hahn v. Kelly is not only singular in its reference to proceedings to outlawry for want of appearance of a party; but the citations from Blackstone, to show that the courts of chancery would proceed to judgment upon a constructive service of process at all analagous to service by publication, establish nothing of the kind; and only seem to do so because they are detached from their context in the volume. They relate to proceedings to compel the appearance of parties after service of the subpœna, which is the original process in chancery, as any one will see, who will read the whole page in Blackstone from which the citations are taken.

Service of the subpœna could indeed be made by leaving a copy at the actual residence of the defendant, as well as by delivering a copy to him personally. And in special cases where an absent or absconding defendant had appointed a person to act as his agent in the matter litigated, substituted service upon such agent in lieu of the principal, was, upon application to the court, sometimes allowed. Adams' Equity, 324; Hobhouse v. Courtney, 12 Simons, 130. But it was not until the statute of 5th George II., c. 25, that proceedings could be taken by publication, without service in one of the modes indicated. That statute authorized proceedings by proclamation published in the London Gazette, and read in the parish church and posted in the Royal Exchange, where a defendant had absconded to avoid service. It did not apply to a citizen or subject of another government who had never been in the realm.

Passing from Hahn v. Kelly, we proceed to consider the other positions taken by the defendant to defeat a recovery. It is contended by her counsel: 1st. That the cases of Gray and Eaton were suits in rem, and that the decree in the consolidated suit bound the property without reference to the defective service of summons upon the infant. 2d. That the district court had authority to appoint a guardian ad litem for the infant without previous service upon her; and 3d. That the decree in the consolidated suit was not reversed as to the widow Matilda.

1st. Suits in rem may be divided into four classes: 1st, those which are directed primarily against particular property, and are intended to dispose of it without reference to the title of individual claimants; 2d, those which are instituted to determine the status of particular property or persons; 3d, those which are, in form, personal suits, but which seek to subject property brought by existing lien or by attachment, or some collateral proceeding, under the control of the court, so as to give effect to the rights of the parties; and 4th, those which seek to dispose of property, or relate to some interest therein, but which touch the property or interest only through the judgment recovered. Proceedings in admiralty for the forfeiture of a vessel or goods are instances of the first kind; the suit is there brought against the vessel or goods directly, without reference to the rights of persons, and all parties are notified to appear by a designated day and assert their claims, or the property will be condemned. Proceedings in the probate court, upon the validity of a will, are instances of the second kind; the judgment, when rendered, operating directly upon the status

*In speaking of these terms—"proceeding according to the course of the common law"— the court in Hahn v. Kelly uses this language: "Some words are used to express ideas, and others to ornament them. The more we turn this expression over and examine it by the light of reason, for the purpose of determining to what use it has been put, the more we are inclined to the opinion that it has been used merely from force of habit, or mainly for ornamental purposes. It has a certain rotundity of sound which is quite pleasing to the ear, but leaves no definite impression upon the understanding. It is simply equivalent to a knowing look or a solemn shake of the head, and doubtless it was first used in that sense. When first employed, its use was harmless, for there was then no mode of procedure except such as the common law prescribed, but its continued use where the modes of the common law have been superseded is mischievous."

or condition of the instrument determining its validity or invalidity. Proceedings by attachment against the property of debtors, or to foreclose a mortgage, or other lien upon property, or to partition real estate, are instances of the third kind. Proceedings to compel the execution or cancellation of a conveyance of real property in the state, and proceedings to wind up and dispose of partnership property, are instances of the fourth kind. The third and fourth classes mentioned are not strictly proceedings in rem; but so far as they affect property in the state, they are treated as substantially such proceedings.

In proceedings in rem, notice of some kind is required, but as all property is supposed to be in the possession of its owner either in person or by agent, a seizure of property is, of itself, considered to impart notice of the proceeding to the owner. Therefore, where the property is, at the outset, taken into the custody of the court, the law is less strict in requiring further notice, either generally, by proclamation to all persons, or specially to the reputed owner. But where the property to be affected is not thus at the outset taken into custody, there is no constructive notice given by the proceeding; and the same notice, as provided by law, must be given to the defendant, as in actions where a personal judgment for damages is alone sought. "A proceeding," says the Supreme Court of Vermont, in Woodruff v. Taylor (20 Vermont, 65), where the law on subject of suits in rem is stated with great clearness, "professing to determine the right of property where no notice, actual or constructive is given, whatever else it might be called, would not be entitled to be dignified with the name of a judicial proceeding. It will be a mere arbitrary edict, not to be regarded anywhere as the judgment of a court."

The suits of Gray and Eaton were partly in personam, and were, at the same time, intended to subject property in the state to the disposition of the court; but as the property was not taken into custody at the outset, there was no constructive notice given to the owners or claimants by the proceeding, and the absent and non-resident defendants could only be brought before the court by publication of summons, as provided by statute, and this, as the supreme court held, was never done, so far as the infant Franklina was concerned.

2d. As to the authority of the district court to appoint a guardian, ad litem, for the infant, without previous service upon her, it is sufficient to observe that the supreme court of the state on appeal decided that no such authority existed. The statute requires service of summons on all infants, before a guardian ad litem can be appointed, and makes no difference in this respect between an infant of a few months and one nearly attaining his majority, and the service can no more be dispensed with in the one case than in the other. Besides, there is wisdom in the provision requiring service even upon an infant in its cradle, for the papers, through its nurse or relatives, would almost be sure in such case to find their way into hands of parties who would look after the interests of the child. Be this as it may, it is the proceeding required by the legislature before the jurisdiction of the court can attach; and as Chief Justice TANEY said of a mere formal objection which was insisted upon in the supreme court, nothing is unimportant or to be disregarded which the legislature has prescribed as a condition for exercising the jurisdiction of the court. Where personal service cannot be made by reason of the non-residence in the state or absence of the infant, service must be made by publication as in other cases. Such publication is the prescribed condition to the exercise of jurisdiction over the infant.

3d. The objection that the decree of the district court in the consolidated action was not reversed as to the widow Matilda, is not founded upon fact. There was but one decree, though the court speaks, in its opinion, as though there were two separate decrees before it. This is an evident inadvertance in the language of the court, arising from the fact that the objections to the validity of the decree were taken to the seperate proceedings had before their consolidation. The case was remanded for further proceedings, and on filing the remittitur, the question evidently arose as to what proceedings should be had, and after hearing counsel for the parties, the court ordered a new trial on all the issues as to all the parties. Upon this order the case remained on the calendar of the district court for trial for over a year, and was then dismissed. The order of dismissal was entered in the consolidated suit, and it would appear for greater caution in the seperate suits also.

The decree as to the infant Franklina being void for want of jurisdiction in the district court over her, all proceedings founded upon such decree, so far as her rights are concerned, necessarily partake of the same infirmity. The purchaser of the premises being one of the attorneys of the plaintiff Gray, the law, as held by the supreme court, imputes to him knowledge of the defects in the proceedings which were taken under his direction and that of his partners. The conveyance of the undivided half to his law partner was made after the reversal of the decree, and the latter also took his interest with similar knowledge of the defect. Independently of this fact their title fell with the reversal of the decree. On this subject we can add nothing to what was said in the opinion of the supreme court, except that the doctrine of Reynolds v. Harris was reaffirmed in the late case of Reynolds v. Hosmer reported in 45 California, 617.

As to the claim for rents, we are of opinion that the cost of filling up the water lot, which was a valuable and permanent improvement, is a just offset to the rents received, or which might have been received, by the defendant.

It follows, from the views we have expressed, that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the possession of the premises; and such judgment will be entered upon the findings filed—with costs.

JUDGMENT FOR PLAINTIFF.

BANKRUPT ACT — DISCHARGE OF BANKRUPT — IMPORTANT RULING BY MR. JUSTICE MILLER. — On the 30th of September, Mr. Justice Miller, sitting in the Federal Circuit Court at St. Louis, made a highly important ruling in re King, a bankrupt holding that section 9 of the amendment of 1874, to the bankrupt, act, in relation to the discharge of bankrupts, applies to cases pending at the time that act took effect, as well as to cases thereafter commenced. We shall publish the full opinion next week. The same point has been ruled in the same way by Mr. District Judge Hopkins of the Western District of Wisconsin in re Perkins, which we shall also publish in our next. These two cases deny the conclusion of Mr. District Judge Blatchford, in re Franke, ante, p. 448; S. C., (in full) 6 Chicago Legal News, 414.

The importance of these rulings will be seen when it is considered that there are a large number of cases pending in the United States Courts here, and elsewhere, in which the bankrupts have never applied for discharge, because, under the provisions of the former laws, they were unable to comply with the law's requirements, either by procuring the consent of creditors, or the payment of the required percentage of the debts proved. All these obstacles now disappear, and any bankrupt who has been adjudicated such on the petition of his creditors may be discharged, if he has never been guilty of any fraudulent acts which are a bar to the discharge.

Common Carriers—Liability of Express Companies—Opinion of Judge Ballard in Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Express Company.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—In a note to the opinion of Judge Ballard, published in your journal at page 436, you remarked upon the importance of the question decided, in the above case, and, after referring to the conflicting decisions, closed by suggesting that the better view was against the one there held. A mature examination of the question has convinced me that your impressions are correct. In view of the great public importance of the question, I propose to examine the foundations of the doctrine announced in the opinion.

Brief statement of the facts in the case are as follows: The defendant, the Adams Express Company, became liable to the Bank of Kentucky, the plaintiffs, for the carriage of a package of money, from New Orleans to Louisville. The package was delivered at New Orleans and a receipt given in the usual form, and containing a stipulation against liability of the company for loss by fire. While in transitu, in the usual manner, upon the usual line of railroad, in charge of the defendant's messenger, by a railroad accident, the package of money was destroyed by fire. The railroad upon which the package was carried and lost was not owned or controlled by the defendant.

The bank sued for the money upon the theory that the fire occurred through the negligence of the defendant, or of some one else, whose negligence was imputed to the defendant, and claimed on the trial that the evidence showed negligence on the part of the railroad company, and that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for a loss occasioned by such negligence. But the court instructed the jury that they should disregard the evidence on the question of the negligence of the railroad company, holding that the defendant in such a case is only responsible for the negligence of itself and its employees.

To sustain his view of the case, the learned judge assumes that the express company is but an "ordinary bailee for hire," is only bound to ordinary diligence of itself or its servants, and as the railroad company was not its servant, and as the railroad was not under its control, it was no way responsible for the negligence of those who controlled the railroad and its carriages. The whole opinion is based upon these propositions, and is made up of illustrations based upon them.

Now, if it shall turn out that there are some peculiarities attaching to the relation of the express company here, as carrier, which do not apply to ordinary bailees for hire; for instance, suppose that it shall appear that upon principle, in cases like this, the carrier must not only himself be free from negligence producing the excepted peril, but that all who execute his contract of carriage, whether as agents, servants, employees or sub-carriers, must be equally free from negligence, then the theory must fall: and, therefore, to refute the theory, we have but to show either that this distinction exists, or that this latter liability attaches to ordinary bailees for hire. The result is the same in either case.

The law has regard to names, and forms, and definitions for the protection of rights, and the preservation of principles, but they should not be used to violate the former, or to pervert the latter; and in cases like the one under consideration, the question should not be so much whether the party sought to be made liable comes within a certain technical definition or description, and whether certain incidents are usually attached to, or certain duties generally devolve upon, persons answering this definition or description, as to ascertain in the particular case whether, under the principles and rules of law applicable to the facts, the defendant has been guilty of a breach of contract or duty which entitles the plaintiff to his action. It is by no means safe, in these inquiries, to rely too implicitly upon definitions given in other cases, often given by judges in cases only partially similar, and without much attention to the question whether they are generally accurate, or accurate at all, except in the particular case in which they are used.

Hence, in this inquiry, I shall pay little attention to the question whether the defendant is indeed an "ordinary bailee for hire," or not.

I will now endeavor to consider the question as it strikes me, and by showing that my view is right, and thereby demonstrate that the reasoning of the learned judge is unsound.

The elementary principle underlying the duties and responsibilities of common carriers, is their absolute liability for all losses unless caused by act of God or public enemies. (It is admitted here that the defendant is a common carrier.) Now the courts have held that this stringent common law liability may be limited by special contract between the carriers and the owners or consignors of goods. But as this very strict liability was established in a great part to protect the public against the negligence of carriers and their employees, the law only permits this limitation with a qualification, viz: These carriers shall be permitted to limit their liability by contract, but they shall be required, in good faith and without negligence, to carry out their contracts of carriage, and if such carriers stipulate against loss by a certain peril, and the goods be lost by this peril, still, if the peril, or the loss by the peril, was produced by the carrier's negligence, then, notwithstanding the exemption, he shall pay for the goods; because it is against public policy to permit a party by contract to exempt himself from liability for loss by negligence; and in such a case the burden of proof is on the carrier to show not only a loss within the terms of the exception, but also that the proper care and skill were exercised to prevent it. Graham v. Davis, 4 Ohio St. R. 363. Now, concerning what does this principle of public policy require the absence of negligence, and the exercise of diligence and skill? I answer, concerning the custody and carriage of the goods. Upon whom, and concerning the acts of whom, does this rule against negligence operate? I answer, emphatically, upon the contracting carrier who is claiming exemption under his contract for exemption from loss by the excepted peril; and the rule requires freedom from negligence, that is, proper diligence on the part of every one who has any connection with the carrying out of the contract of transportation. For it is of the very essence of the rule of public policy, that if the loss occurs within the exception, and the exception be relied upon, it shall not prevail, if the loss was produced by the negligence of the carrier himself, or any one executing the contract for him.

How is public policy affected by the question, whether the contracting party carry the goods himself, or whether he put them on another man's cars and hire him to carry them? In the former case he is liable for losses occurring through his own negligence; whatever his contract may be, the law holds him absolutely.

Why should the rule be different should the goods be lost by the negligence of him who is hired by the first carrier to carry the goods? The consignor has no right to claim that the carrier whom he employed shall actually carry the goods. He may carry them on his own vehicles, with his own motive power, upon his own road or the public rivers, as a railroad or river carrier. Here his liability is unquestioned. Or the carrier may, as in the present case, and as is the usage of express and transportation companies, undertake the carriage and receive the whole price for the same, and hire the use of the coaches of railroads and rooms on steamboats in which the goods are kept and carried for hire by the railroads and boats, but in the charge and under the control of the messengers or the servants of the express or transportation companies, and therefore in the actual manual possession of such companies. Now this process of carriage by the car, and the motive power, and under the care of the messenger, is the carrying contracted for. It is but one carrying, and all the instrumentalities used are but the means for the production of the one result, the carriage of the goods. Who is the carrier here? It is not denied the express company is. Whose instrumentalities are these?—the coach, the messenger, the motive power? I answer, the express company's. It employs them, pays for them, and they are the only appropriate instrumentalities by which its contract can be carried out, and without which it could not be fulfilled, and it may be appropriately said here, "qui facit per alium, facit per se." Now does not public policy, as well as natural justice and common sense, demand that before the carrier here can defend under its exemption, it must show an absence of negligence in the use of all these instrumentalities necessary for the fulfillment of the contract? The contract and all the appliances for its fulfillment are alike, in legal effect, the contract and appliances of the express company, as much as if it had owned the locomotive, coaches and other machinery, together with the road and all its equipments. DeMotte v. Saraway, 14 Wendell, 225. What matters it to the owner of the goods whether the carrier owns the road or cars, or hires them? What injury is it to the carrier that it is to be held liable for the negligence of men whom it does not control? If they are not its servants, still it contracts with them for the use of their vehicles and motive power to transport its goods, and they are liable to it for negligence in their use in its service.

If then, as I insist, the negligence of the railway company, in such a case, is the negligence of the express company, the liability of the latter to the owner of the goods carries with it a corresponding liability from the railroad company to the express company.

I concede that this proposition simply illustrates the reasonableness of the rule I maintain, and I am aware that it is said the owner of the goods may pass by the party with whom he contracted and sue the party guilty of the negligence. This may be true, but it does not change the question.

For the owner of the goods selects his carrier and makes his contract; he has a right to sue on that, and has no right to be turned over to a stranger for indemnity, one perhaps irresponible, and at all events one with whom he did not voluntarily deal; while if the express company be liable the shipper has only to look to the man or company whom he selected, and with whom he contracted. Judge Ballard, in all his arguments and illustrations, lays great stress upon the proposition, that the defendant is not to be held liable for negligence of parties over whom it has no control; and as a reason why it should not be so held, he insists that the liability relied on for a recovery is not the liability of the express company as a common carrier, but is only the liability for negligence. But I submit, with great deference, that this position is bare assumption. It may be true that great judges have given sanction to it, but it is utterly without foundation in principle or reason. A common carrier with his liability qualified is none the less a common carrier, except only as his liability is qualified. His liability for negligence was always one of the incidents of the relation, and although carriers were regarded as insurers, and you might charge them in assumpsit and assign non-delivery as a breach, and they could only plead "act of God" or "the King's Enemies," still you had your election to sue the carrier in case for so negligently dealing with the goods, while in his possession for carriage, that they were lost. This common law liability has never been altered, cannot be qualified, and is the gist of the action in the case under consideration, and you may call the defendant as many names as you choose here, but still it is a common carrier, liable to account for loss or damage to the goods arising from negligence in carrying the same, or while in its possession for carriage.

That this carrier employs instrumentalities to execute its contract which it cannot control, is no ground of complaint on the part of the shipper, or of exemption on the part of the carrier. The goods being in its possession from their delivery, whoever deals with them does so with its assent, the same being implied, the acts of those dealing with them while thus in its posession, are its acts. The shipper contracts for freedom from negligence in the handling and transportation of his goods. Whether the carrier chooses to accomplish that by relying simply upon the common carrier's liability of his sub-carrier or co-carrier, or whether he have a special contract, are matters wholly indifferent to the shipper, if he receive what he contracts for. This is all he can ask for. Nor does this rule impose any hardship to the express company, as it has its remedy over upon its sub-carrier or co-carrier.

It strikes me that this view is far more in consonance with the analogies of the law, and far more consistent with the mutual rights, duties and liabilities, both of carriers and shippers, than the one announced in the opinion under review. In the one case the shipper has his remedy against his carrier for loss of his goods through negligence for their carriage, whether the carrier carry them himself, on his own cars, or on another carrier's; or whether he superintend the carriage himself, or commit it wholly to others. And if the carrier carry the goods upon trains controlled by others, and loose the goods by their negligence, he has his remedy over. While in the other case, if the carriage be contracted for by a carrier who carries his goods on the vehicles of others, and the carrier who furnishes the vehicles and the motive power destroys the goods by his carelessness, the owner has no remedy on his contract, nor any at all against the carrier with whom he chooses to deal. But if he has any remedy, it is an action against the actually negligent party, who may be, and generally is, hundreds of miles away from the place of contract.

It seems to me, therefore, that to overturn the former and establish the latter rule, with the results stated, require a more substantial reasons than the one assigned, to-wit: That the carrier who limits his liability by contract, is only a common bailee for hire, and is therefore only liable for the negligence of its own servants, and when such a carrier, under such a contract, carries his goods on the vehicles of another carrier, over whose emyloyees he has no control, he is not liable for their negligence. For convenience of reference I cite the authorities which sustain my view, including those in the former note. Hooper v. Wells, 27 Cal. 11; Chisterer v. Am. Ex. Co., 15 Minn. 270; Redfield on Carriers, sec. 56, 14 Wendell, supra; 4 Ohio St. R., supra; 5 Am. L. R. N. S. 16 (Judge Redfield). Against these authorities upon the precise point, Judge Ballard's opinion stands alone, so far as I know.

Judge Ballard's Opinion (ante, p. 436) in the Express Company Case.

September 21, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.—Judge Ballard in his opinion in The Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Express Co., published in the CENTRAL LAW JAURNAL, of the 3d inst., in a criticism upon the case of Hooper v. Wells, Fargo & Co., cites the following passage from the opinion of the court (27 Cal. p. 30): "Defendants had the means of holding the proprietors of those various vehicles, used in the business of expressmen responsible to them, had they chosen to do so. If they did not take proper means to secure themselves, it was their own fault." Upon which he makes the following observations: 'But I cannot see how any argument can be drawn from this to show that defendants were responsible. Every bailee or depository may hold any one responsible for destroying or injurings good in his possession, but it cannot be maintained that he is responsible for such destruction or injury, unless he by his negligence contribute to the same. Besides the plaintiff had his remedy against the proprietors of those other conveyances which occasioned the loss, (see the N. Y. Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchants Bank, 6 How. 882) and it might be retyrted, 'that if he did not take the proper means to secure himself it was his own fault.'"

The learned judge does not seem to be aware, or at least does not refer to the fact, that the passage cited by him, and another similar passage at the bottom of page 34, have reference to the act of Congress, "to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes" (9 Stat. at L. 635, Sec. 2). Under this act the plaintiff had no remedy against the owners of the exploded steamer, for he did not "laid" his gold upon the steamer, and the retort of the learned judge does not quite meet the case. The argument drawn from the act may not be entitled to much weight, but it certainly does not weaken the position. However this may be, it would seem that the learned judge misconceived the allusion to the statute, which it must be confessed is not so pointed as it might have been. Doubtless, the court took it for granted, that a statute so important would be generally known.

LEX.

BOSTON, September, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Lemuel Shaw was appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, and took his seat on the bench at the September term of the court at Lenox, for Berkshire, in 1830. He had tried and argued many cases with and against Prescott, and Sullivan, Webster and Hubbard, Gorham and Cooke, Fletcher and Rand, Blake and Samuel D. Parker, Leland and Fuller, and Townsend and Kilborn Whitman, the great lawyers of that time, and he had generally prevailed. And it is really instructive to look into the reports and see how he prevailed. It was never by cheat or any dextrous artifice or vicious practice, nor yet by what passes for eloquence or oratory, but simply through the clearness of his understanding and his ability to interpret and make others understand the case as he undersood it. It is sometimes said, men want words to express their thoughts. My belief is, the difficulty is not often in the want of words, but in the want of understanding. A child that understands will somehow make you understand.

At the time of his appointment, Judge Shaw was associated as a partner with Sidney Bartlett, Esq., already then distinguished in his profession, and now, as is well known, one of the most eminent among the lawyers of the United States. The firm in 1830, had a large and lucrative practice. Before proceeding in the discharge of the other appropriate duties of the court, Judge Shaw made a most excellent address to the bar, in which he sketched the life and character of his predecessor, Judge Parker. The address is printed in the appendix to the 9th Volume of Pickering's Reports. He gave no written opinion at that term. Many of the opinions at that time were only "Per Curiam." His first written opinion was in the case of Bull v. Loveland, 11th Pick. 12, in which the general question was, whether a witness, against his own consent, can be called to testify to any fact pertinent to the issue between other parties, where such testimony may tend to charge him with a debt or subject him to pecuniary loss or liability, but where it does not tend to expose him to punishment or subject him to any penalty or forfeiture. And it was held that the witness might properly be called and examined in such a case,—a question of little or no interest now, when, in this commonwealth, and I believe in most of the states, the cases in which persons may be witnesses and those in which they cannot be compelled to testify, are clearly defined by statute. At the trial of Joseph J. Knapp, Jr., at Salem, in November, 1830, Judge Shaw did not sit. John Francis Knapp had been tried, as principal, in the same murder, a few months previously, before Putnam, Wilde and Morton, and it was probably deemed best by Judge Shaw, just then appointed, that he should leave to them to try the accessories also. Mr. Webster was employed by the law officers to aid them in the trials. John Francis Knapp had requested to have Robert Rantoul, Jr., then recently admitted an attorney of the court of common pleas, but not of the supreme court, assigned as one of his counsel, but the court refused the request, and William H. Gardner and Franklin Dexter were appointed. One cannot but wish that Judge Shaw had sat in these trials. The truth is, that with Judge Putnam, the defendants' counsel were overshadowed by Mr. Webster. He was in the zenith. They were—not, indeed, at the nadir, but yet not far enough up from the edge of the horizon to pour the glow on to Judge Putnam. One cannot but see, that on the question of the admission of the testimony of Coleman—that pious man who visited the prisoners in their cells, and told them how sorry he was to see them there, and that he would die before he would reveal what they might tell him, and so induced them to confess, and then told the court and jury, that, being a clergyman, he supposed he could not be required to disclose what was said to him,—and who, when he found he had not testified to enough to make his testimony competent in the judgment of Judge Wilde and Judge Morton, for want of which the prisoners must be acquitted,—and who also, after an adjournment, on coming into court the next morning, recollected and testified to just enough more to overcome the objections of these two judges, and so make his testimony competent—one cannot but see, I say, that in the argument on the admissibility of the testimony of this man, Mr. Dexter was right.

I have said, when it was known that Judge Shaw had given an opinion upon any question, discussion of that question stopped. One of the most notable instances of this, was the case of Sims. The last fugitive slave act was passed in September, 1850. Sims was held to service by James Potter, at or near Savannah in the state of Georgia, from whence he escaped to Massachusetts. Potter executed a power of attorney to one Bacon, to claim Sims and procure him to be delivered up. In March, 1851, Bacon came to Boston, with this power. No such fugitive had yet been delivered up in Massachusetts, on claim of the owner. An attempt had been made in the case of Crafts, in October, 1850, but Crafts had eluded the Marshal's deputies, and was now safe, and withal a hero in London. Shadrack, the property of Purser DeBuee, had been apprehended, and had got away from the deputy Marshal, at lunch time. The deputy, as he said, pointed his finger, and said—"shoot him!" but nobody had the tools, and Shadrack ran like a "quarter-horse," the crowd cheering as he went; nor let any thing green grow under his feet until he reached Canada. The deputy died without seeing Shadrack any more. Thus these two attempts ended. Sims was the object of the third.

In behalf of Potter, the owner, Bacon made a complaint to George T. Curtis, Esq., a Commissioner of the Circuit Court of the United States, for this district; upon which complaint Mr. Curtis issued a warrant, directed to the Marshal or either of his deputies, commanding him or them, in the name of the President of the United States, forthwith to apprehend Sims, and bring him before the said commissioner, at the court house in Boston, to answer to the complaint, and then and there to be dealt with according to law. The warrant was put in the hands of one Byrnes, a deputy Marshal. Francis Tukey was Marshal of the city of Boston. He was the most efficient police officer that Boston ever had. He undertook to make the arrest; and before the next morning Sims was found, thrust into a carriage, and hurried off to the court house. The trial went on before Mr. Commissioner Curtis. There was great excitement all about the city. Business was suspended. The streets leading to the court-house were crowded. There were more pistols in the court room than Mr. Moulton had in that eventful night in Mr. Beecher's chamber. Meanwhile Mr. Samuel E. Sewall presented to Judge Shaw a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and spoke briefly in favor of the writ. But the court refused to grant the writ, on the ground that no sufficient cause for granting it was shown in the petition. A few days afterwards Mr. Rantoul and Mr. R. H. Dana, Jr., presented another similar petition; and Mr. Rantoul argued: 1, The commissioner is required to find the fact that service is due to the claimant,— which is to exercise a judicial power; whereas, the commissioner is not a judge within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and since his decision of that fact is made conclusive, the act is unconstitutional and void. 2. That congress had no power to legislate at all upon the subject. Judge Shaw gave the opinion of the court, at the conclusion of the argument, deciding: 1. Before a writ of habeas corpus will be issued, sufficient probable cause must be shown; and that in this case no such cause was shown. 2. He proceeded to consider the circumstances under which the constitution was made, and the great social and political objects and purposes which the people of the United States had in adopting it, and the relations which the several states held to each other, and he arrives at the conclusion that it was intended to guaranty to the owner of a slave, living within the territory of a state in which slavery is permitted, the rights conferred upon such owner by the law of such state. 3. That the purpose of the act was to regulate and give effect to the right secured by the constitution. It contemplated a prompt and summary proceeding. It secured to the claimant the aid and assistance of certain magistrates and officers, so as to enable the owner to exercise this right in a more regular and orderly manner, and without being chargeable with a breach of the peace; and that Congress had a right to vest the power of inquiry—whether regarded as judicial or otherwise—in magistrates such as these commissioners. The whole court concurred. Afterwards, Judge Shaw supplemented this opinion with a "Note"—7 Cush. 285. Sims was sent back to Savannah. There was no further discussion as to what the law was. The next most notable such instance was Fisher v. McGirr, in which the liquor law of 1852 was declared to be unconstitutional.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Pacific Law Reporter, for September 22, publishes an opinion of Mr. Circuit Judge Sawyer, expounding the Pacific Railroad Land Grant, and passing upon several questions relating to Mexican grants.

It also publishes Thompson v. Fland, Supreme Court of California. This is an opinion on a motion for a rehearing. It has no syllabus, but is headed "Assignee—Note—Conversion—Collateral Security."

In People v. Perdue, the Supreme cour of California refused to hear an application for bail by a prisoner who had appealed from a judgment sentencing him to the penitentiary for manslaughter, because the district judge had not exercised his legal discretion in the matter.

The Legal Intelligencer, for September 25, contains several decisions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, with very brief head-notes. These are as follows:

Wilmoth v. Thomas & Canfield: The payment of taxes is a questinn of fact for the jury. The plaintiff cannot recover without actual possession.

McCrone v. Humrick: A., who took the deed for certain property, which was actually paid for by B., and afterwards conveyed it to B. in fulfillment of the trust, has no right of action against C., who purchased the property at sheriff sale as B.'s property, before the deed to B. had been made, and while the legal title was in A.

Miles v. Miles: A husband's ground for divorce can only be such as stated in the acts of 1854 and 1855. The court should, before granting the husband's divorce under the act of 1855, consider the question of the amount of alimony to be granted to the wife.

Mishler v. Reed: Bona fide purchasers of negotiable paper for value cannot be affected by private understandings between third parties. [We should think so. But isn't this too much brevity?]

Brubaker's Adm'rs. v. Taylor: When the plaintiff is called as a witness by the defendant under the act of April 15th, 1869, the defendant has a right to examine her as if under cross examination.

In Sleek v. Turner, the court (Sharswood, J.) hold, following Wilson v. City Bank, (ante, p. 40) that a judgment dated more than four months prior to the adjudication of bankruptcy, but entered, and execution issued thereon within that time, is not ipso facto fraudulent.

Smith v. Johnson, holds that a fence that is not on the line, but has been put entirely on the property of the adjoining owner by him is under his complete control.

In Culbertson's Appeal the widow guardian of the minor children, and the administrator of the decedent, entered into an agreement by which certain money in the administrator's hands was to be held until the death of the widow, she receiving the interest, and then the principal to go to the children. Held, that when the children were all of age, they, in conjunction with the widow, could compel the administrator to pay over the principal.

Head-note to Seeds v. Kahler: A wife may purchase property on the credit of her separate estate, and hold it against the creditors of her husband.

Head-note to Fry's Appeal: Where the funds arising from a sheriff's sale are insufficient to pay liens prior to judgment, it is error to apply any of the fund in payment of the costs on such judgment arising prior to the issuing of the fi. fa.

The Chicago Legal News, for September 26, publishes the opinion of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, Longyear, J., in the case of the tug Champion, holding that a person who furnished supplies in a foreign port, to a vessel owned and registered in Detroit, had a lien upon such vessel which could be enforced in said court, but that upon the assignment of such claim the lien became divested, and neither the orginal claimant nor the assignee could sustain a libel against the vessel to enforce the payment of the claim.

Also an opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by Walker, C. J., in Mix v. People, holding that a levy in excess of the per cent. allowed by the constitution is void only for the excess, when the amount authorized can be separated from the portion that is illegal; that the section of the law of 1872 requiring the proper authorites of towns, etc., to certify to the county clerk, on or before the second Tuesday of August, the several amounts which they require to be raised for taxation, is not directory, but peremptory; that this law does not apply to the auditor's certificate; that the equalization in this case was unjust and unconstitutional. What the learned chief justice says upon the principles governing equalization, will repay careful study, and should the cour apply these principles to future tax cases, as we have no doubt it will, the people will soon see that it is for their interest to elect competent men to levy and collect their taxes, and the manner of executing our revenue law will soon be reformed.

Also an opinion in the same court by Scott, J., in Korf v. Lill, holding, in a mechanic's lien case, that the certificate of the architect is conclusive of the rights of the parties, unless impeached for fraud or mistake; that it would impose a great hardship upon a contractor to make him liable for damages on account of defective work done by a sub-contractor, after the sub-contractor had been fully paid under the direction of the architect, who was the agent of the owner; that in the absence of any agreement for notice of the decision of the architect, the parties will be deemed to have waived it.

Also an opinion of the Third District Court of Utah, by McKean, C. J., in ex parte Sanders, refusing to admit an alien to citizenship who denied the constitutionality of the law against polygamy.

The Albany Law Journal, for September 26, contains a report of the case of Matthews v. Massachussetts National Bank (ante, p. 469): It is proper to state that this opinion is much longer and more elaborate than the same opinion as published by us, and contains citations of many authorties. The opinion as we gave it, was furnished us by a correspondent in Boston, and after the issue of our journal containing it had been printed, we received in phamphlet form the more elaborate opinion which the Albany Law Journal now publishes. Whether the opinion, as given by us, is an adjudgment, or whether as given by the Albany Law Journal it is a second edition of the original opinion, we are as yet unable to say.

SOME RECENT BANKRUPTCY CASES.—The case of Franke, 6 Chi. Leg. News, 414, in which Mr. District Judge Blatchford ruled that the 9th section of the amendatory bankrupt act of 1874, applies only to future cases, and that consequently a bankrupt, who had been adjudicated such prior to June 22, 1874, was not entitled to his discharge unless his estate would pay fifty per centum of the claims proved against it, has attracted considerable attention. We received almost simultaneously with each other, three opinions overruling this position, namely, that of Mr. Justice Miller, Federal Circuit Court at St. Louis, in re King; that of Mr. District Judge Lowell, District of Massachusetts, in re Griffiths, and that of Mr. District Judge Hopkins, Western District of Wisconsin, in re Perkins. These we print elsewhere. The opinion of Mr. District Judge Hopkins will attract attention, from the fact that he holds that voluntary bankrupts, who were adjudicated such prior to the passage of the late act, are likewise entitled to their discharge, without reference to the percentage of their assets, or the consent of their creditors, although their assets must have paid fifty per cent. of their debts under the law as it previously stood, and thirty per cent. under the law as it now stands, unless a certain number and value of creditors consent to the discharge.

INJUNCTION BY FEDERAL COURTS AGAINST STATE TAXATION.—The injunction suits pending in the Federal Circuit Court at Saint Louis, Bailey v. Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, et al., (ante. p. 418), which have for their object the enjoining of the tax collectors along the line of certain railroads in Missouri from collecting the taxes lately assessed by the state board of equalization, have been exhaustively argued at the present term before Mr. Justice Miller, Mr. Circuit Judge Dillon and Mr. District Judge Treat. The court, without reaching any definite result, made a very important order, and laid down a principle applicable to all future cases of this character, which is, in the language of Mr. Justice Miller, "that whenever a party comes into this court to ask this court to enjoin the collection of taxes, or the collection of part of a tax, if there is any part which they admit to be due or just, or which the court can see in the statement made in the bill ought to be paid, there must be an allegation in the bill conforming to the fact, that they have paid it, or that they have tendered it; and it is not a sufficient allegation to come and say that we are willing, or even that we have paid it in to the court, because the state is not to be stayed in its revenue, which is admitted to be due in that way; and a party claiming that he will not pay his taxes or any portion of them, cannot screen himself during the course of a long litigation from paying that which must be paid, and which everybody can see must be paid, by setting up a contest over that which is doubtful, and which may, or may not, be necessary to be paid."

The court made an order applicable to each of the railroad companies concerned, by which some sixty per cent. of the amounts assessed against each of them is to be paid by the second of January next, or the bills will stand dismissed.

TWO RAILWAY CASES.—The recent decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri, which we elsewhere print, in Baker v. Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company, introduces into the jurisprudence of Missouri a principle which has been settled elsewhere, namely, that where the owner of land, by a written or parol license, grants permission to a railroad company to construct its road over his land, in consideration of an agreement to perform some subsequent act by the railroad company, such as the fencing of the track, and in pursuance of such license the road is constructed, but the subsequent condition is not performed, the land-owner cannot maintain ejectment, but can maintain a bill for specific performance or an action for damages. The recent decision of the same court, in Provost v. Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company, which we also print in another place, is similar in principle. It holds that where a railroad company has proceeded under the statute to condemn the land of a land-owner, for its roadway, and the land-owner objects to the damages assessed, and procures the appointment of a second commission, the company, in the meantime, paying into court the damages first assessed, and proceeding with the construction of its road (in pursuance of a provision in its charter authorizing it to do so) without further objection from the land-owner, the latter cannot, because the second commission awarded greater damages, which award was confirmed, and which damages the company has failed to pay, maintain ejectment for the land thus taken. The principle on which this case is made to turn appears to be, that although the payment of the land-damages is a condition precedent to the right of the railroad company to enter upon the land (Walther v. Warner, 25 Mo. 277), yet the owner, by permitting it to enter without objection, waived his right to pre-payment of the damages, elected to rely solely on his remedy to compel payment, should it be afterwards refused, and created an estoppel against himself, which would prohibit him from recovering the premises. In the former case, the doctrine applicable to the revocation of licenses is discussed by Mr. Justice Wagner with his usual clearness.

Admiralty Lien for Supplies and Materials in the Home Port.

At the present term of the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, Mr. Justice Miller of the supreme court made an important decision on the above subject in the case of Taylor v. Steamer Commonwealth, on appeal from the district court. The learned judge of the district court held that there might be a lien in admiralty for the necessary supplies and repairs for a vessel furnished and made in the home port, and the correctness of this view was assented to and asserted by Mr. Justice Miller. The district judge held that the lien in such a case would not be displaced or defeated by reason of an agreement with the material-man by which the latter was to furnish security for the advances to the vessel, if such agreement was in fact never complied with or security given, but on this point his decision was reversed by Mr. Justice Miller. Undoubtedly the view of the learned justice is in accord with the spirit which has hitherto pervaded the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, and was required by those decisions, but, we may be permitted to observe that it has somewhat of the flavor of the common law hostility to admiralty liens.

In delivering his judgment, which was orally pronounced, Mr. Justice Miller, in substance, observed:

The owners of the boat were residents of St. Louis, and the repairs were done in a home port. Our supreme court had decided very many times that no admiralty lien existed by reason of repairs and supplies in the home port of the vessel, and there is no decision of the Supreme Court of the United States reversing or changing that doctrine. But the sentiment of the profession of the country—that part of the profession which devotes itself to admiralty practice—and the sentiment, he thought, of parties interested in vessels, had been that this was not a sound doctrine. It is a doctrine which we have derived from the English courts. It is the doctrine of the English courts that no such admiralty lien can be had in the home ports of the country. The English courts say that a man has a lien while he has possession, and he may have such statutory liens as the law of the land gives him, but he has not a maritime lien for such services at home. We have heretofore followed that doctrine. It is not the doctrine of continental states, and it is not the doctrine of the civil law. The doctrine is the other way in continental ports. Our courts have held that supplies in a foreign port may be a lien on a vessel, on the ground that the owner is not there, and it is necessary these supplies should be made. As he had said, there is a strong feeling that the doctrine ought to extend to home ports, and a rule of the Supreme Court of the United States prescribed for admiralty, which forbids the bringing of suits in rem for this class of cases, has been repealed by the supreme court. He violated no propriety in saying that he thought the supreme court repealed the rule, that the question involved in these cases might come up for consideration. He had no hesitation in saying that if there was nothing more than he had stated, that Mr. Taylor had repaired the vessel for $20,000, he would affirm the judgment of the district court when it gave a lien and order the vessel to be sold to pay it. He thought the doctrine would be upheld by the supreme court. He had no doubt that the law adopted by the English courts is not the general maritime law, and in this country we are governed by the general maritime law as it may be gathered from all the maritime nations of the world. The English law, on the contrary, had been the result of that conflict between the courts of the common law, especially the Court of Queen's Bench, in Great Britain, which was jealous of all other courts. He had no hesitation in saying that the rule of allowing a lien for repairs ought to be extended to a vessel in a home as well as in a foreign port, and this work and labor would have constituted such a lien, if the parties had permitted it to rest on the implied result of the work and labor done under such circumstances. Unfortunately they did not. They entered into a contract, showing on what they did rely. They made an agreement with the owners of the vessel before the work was done. The agreement was this: That if the repairs did not exceed $10,000, they were to be paid for one-half in cash and the other half in endorsed notes. If they exceeded $10,000 they were to be paid, one-third in cash and the balance in endorsed notes. This showed that there was other security relied on than the boat. It was clear that Mr. Taylor, in making the contract, never intended to rely on the security of the vessel itself. What was the use of relying on the vessel when he had cash for one-half and endorsed note for the other. Having made that contract, he could not rely on the vessel for a lien. It must have been the intention to rely on the credit of the vessel in order to give the right to an admiralty lien. Here the contract for other security shows that he did not intend to rely on the vessel for lien, and he has no lien, although the owners failed to keep their contract, to make the payment or give the stipulated security.

At the request of the learned justice an appeal was prayed and allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States, which will present to the court for authoritative decision some very interesting questions of admiralty law, not now free from doubt, and which urgently demand settlement.

It will be recollected that the first hundred pages of Mr. Benedict's work on Admiralty is devoted to a learned discussion of the question whether the constitution of the United States, in granting to the federal judiciary cognizance of "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," intended to grant only such jurisdiction as had been left to the English Court of Admiralty by the enchroachments of the Court of King's Bench, or such jurisdiction as was possessed by the Colonial Vice Admiralty Courts at the time of the American revolution, on whether it was a broad and comprehensive grant, intended to embrace all subjects properly cognizable in courts of admiralty, according to the usages of the maritime nations of Europe. The last view is strongly urged by Mr. Benedict, and seems to be a favorite one with admiralty lawyers. This is the view entertained by Mr. Justice Miller, as will be seen from that part of the above abstract where he says that "in this country we are governed by the general maritime law, as it may be gathered from all the maritime nations of the world."

License to Construct Railroad on One's Land—Non-performance of Condition Subsequent—Ejectment.

ISAAC BAKER v. CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Present, Hon. WASH ADAMS,
" DAVID WAGNER,
" WM. B. NAPTON,
" H. M. VORIES, } Judges.

1. License to Railway Company to Construct Road on Plaintiff's Land—Ejectment.—The plaintiff executed and delivered to the agent of the lessor of the defendant, a railway company, a written license to construct its road across his land, which license was not to be delivered to the company until it should comply with the law in regard to fences, cattle-guards and farm crossings. The company having constructed its road, without objection being made, across the plaintiff's land, and having failed to comply with these conditions, the plaintiff brought ejectment. Held, that this was not the proper remedy. The agreement to construct fences, etc., was a condition subsequent, and the plaintiff might maintain a suit for specific performance, or for damages.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

J. H. Shanklin and M. A. Low, for appellant.

1. The Chicago and Southwestern Railway Company entered on the land in controversy and made valuable, costly and permanent improvements, with the leave, license and consent of the respondent, who agreed to relinquish his land damages, upon condition that the company should comply with the law in regard to fencing, etc. The conditions in the agreement were conditions subsequent and not conditions precedent. The respondent cannot now, after he has permitted said company to expend large sums of money thereon, recover the land with the improvements, because the company failed to fully perform the conditions of the contract. He can have the contract specifically performed, or may recover damages for the non-performance of it, or he may pursue the remedy that the statute gives—build the fence, gates and crossings and recover the cost of the company. 2. A parol license executed, frequently amounts to a grant, and is irrevocable. The expenditure of money or labor by one man on the land of another, under a license given by the owner, will estop the owner from revoking the license, and wresting the possession of the land from the licensee. A license thus executed gives an absolute right, and the licensor will be estopped from revoking it to the injury of the licensee. A license by parol is as irrevocable as a license by deed; in either case the license may be revoked before it is executed, but not after. Winter v. Brockwell, 8 East, 308; People v. Goodwin, 5 N. Y. 568; Huff v. McAuley, 53 Penn. 206; Rhodes v. Otis, 33 Ala. 578; Dyer v. Connall, 4 Penn. 353; Bridge Co. v. Bragg, 11 N. H. 702; Liggins v. Juge, 7 Bing. 682; Woodbury v. Parshley, 7 N. H. 237; Addison v. Hack, 2 Gill, 221; Bigelow on Estoppel, 527; Herman on Estoppel, 437, Sec. 439.

4. Where one acquiesces in the occupation of his land for the construction of a railroad, without prepayment of the land damages, upon an understanding or contract for the future payment by the company, and the road is constructed and put in operation, he cannot afterwards, on failure to obtain payment, maintain ejectment for the land. McAuley v. Western, etc., R. R. Co., 33 Vt. 311; s. c. 1 Redf. Amer. Rail. Cas. 245; B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Strauss, 37 Md. 237; Hornback v. Cincinnati, etc., R. R. Co., 20 Oh. 5. The court ought to have declared the law as asked by appellants. It was proven by the testimony of the plaintiff's son that he knew that the work of constructing the railroad over the land in question was going on, and that he made no objections, but acquiesced in the act of the company in entering on the land and constructing their road, without prepayment of the land damages. In the exercise of the right of eminent domain, delegated to them, the railroad company had the power to appropriate the land against the will of the owner, subject only to his right to prepayment of his land damages, if insisted on by him. But for the constitutional limitation on this power, the company might be authorized to appropriate land without making any compensation to the owner. The prepayment is a condition precedent, made for his protection and benefit alone, and he may waive it if he choose.

When he stood by and saw the work going on and made no objection, the railroad company might well suppose that he did not insist on prepayment of his damages.

And the shortest period of clear acquiescence, so as fairly to lead the company to infer that the party intends to waive his right to present payment, will conclude his right to arrest the claim in any such form as to stop the running of the road after it has been put in operation, whereby the public acquire important interest in its continuance. McAuley v. Western Vt. Rw., supra.

"Although railroad companies in some respects, resemble private corporations, yet as they are organized for the public benefit, the state regards them as matters of public concern. They are looked upon by the laws as corporations endowed with capacities for the promotion of the public good and for the diffusion of advantages to the state as a body politic." Dunn v. North Missouri R. R. Co., 24 Mo. 493.

The people along the line of this road, individually and as municipalities, have important interests in its continued operation, and the ejectment of the company from any portion of the line, at the suit of the respondent, would be to sacrifice the interests of thousands of the people of the state in an important line of commerce, and interrupt a United States mail route established by law, at the suit of an individual who has other adequate remedies not fraught with such consequences. High on Injunctions, 231, § 417; Elmslie v. Delaware, etc., 4 Whart. 424; Delaware, etc., v. Raritan, etc., 1 McCart. 445; Torrey v. Camden, etc., 3 C. E. Green, 293.

The statute of frauds can have no application to this case, because the company acquire title by exercise of the right of eminent domain, and not by grant from the owner. When land damages can be settled by agreement between the owner and the body exercising the right to appropriate, no proceedings to condemn, other than the actual appropriation, are necessary or proper. In such a case the owner receives his damages and the title passes by operation of the sovereign power to appropriate. No release is necessary to divest the owner of title. The law of grants between individuals is not applicable to such a case.

It is admitted as a general proposition that a vendee in possession, under a contract of sale, who fails to pay the purchase money, may be ejected by the vendor. But there is no similarity between such a case and the one at bar. The relation of vendor and vendee does not exist between the parties here, and no such relation is set up in the pleadings. No grant for a valuable consideration is alleged or claimed by either party.

It is not true that the respondent has no remedy by which he may recover land damages. If the entry was without his consent or acquiescence, he may maintain trespass, in which action the measure of damages would be the same as in a proceeding to condemn. Mueller v. St. Louis, etc., R. R. Co., 31 Mo. 262; Soulard v. City of St. Louis, 36 Mo. 546. Or he might sue for the value of the land. 1 N. H. 339; 7 Mass. 202.

He may have the contract specifically enforced, or may sue for the breach thereof. He is pregnant with remedies, all adequate.

It is not true that a right of easement, such as is claimed by appellants, can only be created by deed. In the case of Blair v. Smith, 16 Mo. 273, the supreme court held that "where the owners of contiguous lots mutually establish a boundary line between them and build up to it, and use and occupy according to it for a period long enough to show their agreement and acquiescence, although less than the period which would be a bar under the statute of limitations, they, and those claiming under them, will be estopped from afterwards claiming a different boundary." There was no element of fraud or mistake in this case. See also, Lindell v. McLaughlin, 30 Mo. 28, per Napton, J.: "Where a man misleads another by his acts or words, so as to cause the expenditure of money on the part of the latter, the former will not be allowed to change his assertions or claims to the detriment of the person mislead. It is a practical fraud, although no fraud may be intended, to permit this to be done." This was a question of a disputed boundary line, involving no misrepresentation or mistake. The decision was founded solely on the doctrine of estoppel by acquiescence.

Porter and Turner, for respondent.

WAGNER, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action of ejectment to recover possession of a strip of land composing a portion of the right of way of the Chicago and Southwestern Railway Company, on which the track is located and built, and the trains now running.

The defendant answered, interposing a general denial; and for further answer and defence, stated that during the years 1870 and 1871, the Chicago and Southwestern Railway Company, a corporation duly incorporated and organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Missouri, located and constructed said road from the city of Washington, in the state of Iowa, to the city of Leavenworth, in the state of Kansas, which said railroad ran through and across the land described in the petition. That after said railroad had been located across said land, and before the construction thereof had been commenced by said last named company, plaintiff, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad, made, executed and delivered to said last named company, a deed of conveyance, granting to the company the real estate to be held and used by them for the purpose of constructing and maintaining their said road thereon: and that said Chicago and Southwestern Railway Company, on or about the first day of October, 1870, entered upon said land and constructed their said railroad over and across the same, with the knowledge and consent and license of plaintiff, and continued from that time to occupy and use said land for the purpose aforesaid until about the 9th day of October, 1871, when they leased and demised all of their said railroad, and the lands appurtenant thereto, including the lands described in the petition, to the defendants.

That at the time of said leasing said Chicago and Southwestern Railway Company were in the possession of said strip of land by the acquiescence, leave, license and consent of plaintiff, as well as by right of said grant to them, and that being so in the possession thereof, they delivered the possession to the defendants who have ever since continued to occupy and use the same with said railroad; that ever since said 9th day of October, 1871, defendants have been running, and still are running and operating said railroad, and are running passenger and freight trains daily, etc. To this answer the plaintiff filed a replication, and the cause was submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury.

The evidence showed that the plaintiff lived near the railroad when it was being built; that he made no objection to their building the same on his land, and that he proposed giving them the right of way if they would fence the road and make cattle-guards and crossings within thirty days after the completion of the same. It was also shown that the plaintiff executed a relinquishment of the right of way to the land in controversy, conditioned that the company should comply with the law in regard to fencing, cattle-guards and farm crossings, and delivered the same to the agent of the company, upon the condition, however, that it was not to be delivered to the company till they complied with its terms. The relinquishment was never delivered by the agent to the company, they having failed to erect the fences and cattle-guards.

Upon the case as thus made, the defendants asked the court to declare the law as follows: "1. If the court finds that plaintiff acquiesced in the occupation of his land for the construction of the Chicago and Southwestern Railroad, without prepayment of his land damages, upon an understanding or contract with the Chicago and Southwestern Railway Company, that in thirty days after the completion of their road over plaintiff's land they would fence their road where it runs through plaintiff's land, and put in cattle-guards and farm crossings, in compliance with the requirements of the general railroad law of the state, and that the road is completed and in operation, even though the court finds that the road has not been fenced where it runs through plaintiff's land, he cannot recover.

"2d. If the court finds that plaintiff consented to the occupation of the land in controversy, for the construction of said railroad, and executed a conveyance of the right of way over the same to the Chicago and Southwestern Railroad Company, conditioned that said company should, in thirty days after the completion of said road over said land, fence said road where it runs through plaintiff's land, and put in cattle-guards and farm crossings, in compliance with the requirements of the general railroad law of this state, which said conveyance was placed in the hands of John M. McMichael, to be delivered to said company if its conditions should be complied with, even though the court finds that said company has not fenced said road, as by the terms of said conveyance they were required to do, the court must find for defendant."

The court refused to declare the law as prayed for by defendants, and then gave judgment for plaintiff. Whereupon the defendants bring the case here by appeal.

It is admitted that the defendants have not complied with the conditions upon which the plaintiff authorized them to enter upon his land, and build their road, and the only question is whether he can treat his permission as an entire nullity and recover the premises in ejectment.

In a case in North Carolina, entirely similar to this, a party proposed to a railroad company that he would give them the right of way to locate their road over a certain portion of his land, provided they would open, grade and put in order a street on the part in front of his house. The road was built, but the company failed to comply with the condition as to opening the street. The party afterwards notified the company that unless the condition was performed within fifteen days he should repossess himself of his land covered by the roadbed. The company then applied for an injunction to restrain him from carrying out his threatened purpose of repossessing himself of his land, and the court sustained it, holding that the opening of a street was not a condition precedent to the exercise of the right to locate. In the opinion, the judge who delivered the judgment of the court, remarks: "All that was done here was done by the consent of the defendant. Neither can there be any question as to the right of both parties to the specific performance of its side of the contract between them. If the plaintiff should bring an action for such a purpose, it will be entitled to a grant of the right of way upon a performance of its side of the contract. And if the defendant desire to hasten the company in such performance, he can bring his action, in which he will be entitled to have such performance within a reasonable time; or to have the contract rescinded." Williamston & Tarboro R. R. Co. v. Battle, 66 N. C. 540.

In the case of McAuley v. Western Vermont Railway, 33 Vt. 311, it was decided that payment of land damages was a condition precedent to the acquiring of title by a railroad company of lands taken for their road. But where an owner acquiesed in the occupation of his land for the construction of a railroad, without prepayment of the land damages, upon an understanding or contract for future payment by the company, and the road was constructed and put in operation; he could not afterwards, on failure to obtain payment, maintain ejectment or trespass for the land.

To the same effect is the case of Hornback v. The Cincinnati & Zanesville Railroad Co., 20 Ohio St. 81, and Earl of Jersey v. Britton Ferry Dock Co., L. R. 7 Eq. 409. Indeed we have been unable, after diligent research, to find any authority supporting the action of the plaintiff on the facts as developed in this case.

When plaintiff permitted the company to go on his land and construct their road-bed, it amounted to a license to them to do that work. The only condition was that they should make fences and put in cattle-guards in a certain time after the road was completed. This was a condition subsequent, and not a condition precedent. The entry under the license was lawful, and under such circumstances, after the expenditure of large sums of money by the defendants, and making a costly structure, can the plaintiff at his mere option and will revoke the license and maintain ejectment?

In Rerick v. Coons, 14 Serg. & Rawle, 267, the defendant had licensed the plaintiff to erect a structure on the defendant's land, by which a stream of water was directed to the plaintiff's mill. There was no writing, but the plaintiff had been at expense in erecting the structure. The defendant afterwards attempted to revoke the license and tore down the structure. The court, speaking through Gibson, C. J., held the plaintiff entitled to damages, and say.: "It is concluded that a mere license is revocable under all circumstances, and at any time. But a license may become an agreement on valuable consideration, as when the enjoyment of it must necessarily be preceded by the expenditure of money, and when the grantee has made improvements or invested capital in consequence of it, he has become a purchaser for valuable consideration."

In this court in the case of Fuhr v. Dean, 26 Mo. 116, the principle is thus laid down: "A mere license may exist by parol, and ordinarily is not assignable, and is revocable unless it has been executed and the party has incurred expense on the faith of it, so that he would be injured by the revocation. 3 Kent, 452; Pierpont v. Barnard, 2 Selden, 279; Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 Mees. & Wells. 838. * * * * A license cannot be countermanded after it has been executed, so as to permit acts done under it to be treated as trespasses; and though sometimes it may not be easy to ascertain the point of time at which a parol license may be revoked, when it is no longer executory, and the licensee has expended money on the faith of it, and is in the enjoyment of the privilege connected with it, yet there must be a time at which it is revocable, otherwise it would create a permanent interest in land. It may be, however, that where acts have been performed upon the faith of a license, the party giving it may be equitably estopped from revoking it, to the injury of the other party, but the estoppel will be limited by the injury it is invoked to prevent."

A license is an authority or power, and marked with the incidents that usually accompany powers. Among these may be mentioned the right of revocation at any time, at the will or pleasure of the person creating the power, or granting the license. But the doctrine that a power may be recalled at the pleasure or discretion of the donor ceases to apply when the power is coupled with an interest, or is necessary to the possession or enjoyment of a right or title arising from the act or contract of the person who creates the power.

Messrs. Hare and Wallace, after a most thorough and exhaustive review of the cases bearing upon this subject, deduce the following conclusion: "From the cases which have been cited, we may deduce two things: one, that a license will be a full justification for the acts done under it, even where they consist in the exercise of an authority or privilege on land, and would, if repeated under an undefeasable right be in effect an estate or easement: the other, that a license cannot be revoked or withdrawn so long as it is essential to the possession or enjoyment of a vested right or interest which has been created by the licensor, or placed with his assent in a situation where the continuation of the license is essential to its enjoyment. These inferences obviously result from the general rule, that no one can recall a promise, or delaration made with a view to influence the course of another, after he has acted upon it; and thus place himself in a position where he must necessarily suffer if it be withdrawn. An equitable estoppel arises under these circumstances to prevent the legal title from being used as a means of injustice. 2 Am. Leading Cases, 5th Ed. 569; 2 Smith's Leading Cases. 5th Am. Ed. 761.

In the present case the defendant entered upon the land of the plaintiff with his consent and license, and made valuable, costly and permanent improvements. There was an agreement to relinquish the right of way on condition that the company should comply with the law in regard to fencing and making cattle-guards, in a certain time after the road should be completed. This condition was not to be performed until after the road was finished and all the expenditures made. It would now be an act of great injustice to allow plaintiff to use his legal title in the manner contemplated by this suit. He had the right to annex whatever conditions he pleased upon his grant. He could have insisted upon the payment of damages before the company acquired any right to proceed with their work upon the land, or that they should have erected the fences, in the first instance, but when he gave them leave and license to do what they did, in consideration of their performing a subsequent condition, he cannot now bring ejectment and oust them from the possession. The interest was created by the licensor, and its enjoyment cannot be revoked in this way. The remedies for the plaintiff are adequate and ample. He may bring his bill for specific performance, and he may recover damages; or he may proceed to build the fences, cattle-guards and crossings, and compel the company to pay therefor.

The court below erred in its rulings, and the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded.

Bankrupt Act—Discharge of Bankrupt—Section 9 of the Act of 1874 Construed.

I. In re KING.

United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Missouri, September Term, 1874.

Before Mr. Justice MILLER.

The ninth section of the amendments of 1874 to the bankrupt act, which relates to the discharge of bankrupts, applies to cases pending at the time that act took effect, as well as to cases thereafter commenced [Denying re Franke, 6 Chicago Legal News, 414.[

The bankrupts applied to the district court for a certificate of final discharge, upon the following facts:

On August 19th, 1870, a creditor's petition was filed against said bankrupts as co-partners, on which, August 26, 1870, an adjudication in bankruptcy was made upon the ground of suspension of payment of commercial paper, more than fourteen days. An assignee was elected September 23d, 1870. The administration of the estate was concluded February 26, 1873. The assets of the estate, which amounted to $575.60, cash, were received and disbursed by the assignee. No dividend was paid on unsecured debts. A secured debt for $250 was proved and paid. Unsecured debts aggregating $1,222.39 were proved and allowed.

All the debts proved were contracted subsequent to December 31st, 1868. Upon all, said King was liable as principal debtor. June 30, 1874, King filed, in the usual form, his petition for final discharge, which was referred to the register for his action in the premises, and thereupon a hearing was ordered and held upon said petition on the 13th day of July, 1874, after due and adequate notice by mail, and publication in the usual form as prescribed by law, to all creditors and others in interest. On that day the oath before final discharge, duly taken by said King, was filed, his last examination was passed, but no consent in writing of his creditors was filed, nor was any opposition made or entered to his application.

The district court, pro forma, refused to grant the discharge, and the bankrupt brings the matter before this court for review under the second section of the bankrupt act.

G. F. Maury, for the bankrupt.

Mr. Justice MILLER, orally delivering the opinion of the court, in substance, said:

It is conceded that the bankrupt should have a discharge unless the fact that his assets did not equal fifty per cent. of the claims proved against his estate disentitles him to his certificate, and this depends upon the construction to be given to section 9 of the act of 1874. In cases of involuntary bankruptcy commenced since that act took effect, it is clear Congress intended that the bankrupt should be discharged without respect to the amount of assets as compared with the amount of debts. But the enquiry here is, does this 9th section apply to cases commenced before the act of 1874 took effect and not then concluded, as well as to cases thereafter commenced? In my judgment it does, and the bankrupt who brings this petition is entitled to his discharge.

I have been shown an opinion of Judge Blatchford, in the matter of Franke, prepared with his usual care, in which a different conclusion is reached. His reasoning is ingenious, but, as it seems to me, somewhat artificial and not at all satisfactory to my mind. I think the general rule is that such remedial provisions do apply to pending cases, unless there is something to show that the legislature intended to exclude them, and I can discover no such intention in the 9th section, or any part of the act of 1874; and this conclusion is very much fortified by the express repeal of the provision in the original act requiring fifty per centum of assets, and by the consideration that the ninth section of the act of 1874 covers the whole ground and provides for both voluntary and involuntary cases. Let it be certified to the district court that the bankrupt is entitled to his final certificate of discharge.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

II. In re GRIFFITHS.

United States District Court, District of Massachusetts,

Before Hon. JOHN LOWELL, District Judge.

Bankruptcy—Discharge.—In cases of involuntary bankruptcy pending on the 22d day of June, 1874, as well as in those since commenced, the bankrupt, if otherwise entitled thereto, is to have his discharge, irrespective of the assent of his creditors or the amount of his assets. [Overruling re Franke, 6 Chi. Leg. News, 414.]

LOWELL, J.—The question presented by the register's certificate is whether section 9 of the act of June 22, 1874, applies to pending cases. It was settled by several decisions in Massachusetts, that such amendments of the law did affect all cases. Ex parte Lane, 3 Met. 213; Eastman v. Hillard, 7 Met. 420; re Bartlett, 8 Met. 72; Eddy v. Ames, 9 Met. 585. But as the law has been pronounced to be otherwise in relation to this statute, in an able opinion of Judge Blatchford's, I feel bound to give briefly my reasons for agreeing with the earlier decisions.

Section 9 says, in substance, that in cases of compulsory bankruptcy, the provisions of the former laws requiring the payment of a certain proportion of debts, or the assent of a certain number of creditors, as a condition of a bankrupt's discharge, shall not apply; but if otherwise entitled, he is to have the discharge without such payment or assent. And in cases of voluntary bankruptcy no discharge will be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to thirty per centum of the debts proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as principal debtor, without the assent of at least one-fourth of his creditors in number and one-third in value; and the provision in section 33 of the principal act requiring fifty per centum of such assets, is hereby repealed.

It is plain, I think, that the section, on the face of it, applies to all cases in which a discharge is applied for after the passage of the act. It was so explained to the house of representatives by Mr. Tremain, who had the bill in charge, (Congressional Record, June 17, 1874, p. 60), and the words are almost precisely like those of the statute which was so construed in ex parte Lane, 3 Met. 213, in which Wilde, J., speaking for the court, said: "This court can have no authority to grant a discharge against a prohibition in the statute." And the other cases cited are similar. In all, the law was changed without any express application to future or past cases, and the court unhesitatingly applied it to both clases. This construction is aided by the express words of repeal which are found in sections 9 and 21. The repeal is unqualified, and I know of no rule which will authorize me to limit the scope of the enactment of repeal, unless it were, indeed, to save the rights or titles already vested.

And this brings me to what I venture to call the fallacy that such a change in the bankrupt law is retroactive if it is made to affect pending cases. A law which discharges debts already contracted, may well be called retroactive; and this law, if retroactive at all, would be so not merely as to cases begun, but as to contracts entered into before its passage. But it is well settled that a mere modification of the conditions upon which a discharge shall be granted to bankrupts, is not retroactive. "It is clear," says the eminent jurist already quoted, "that the appellant had no vested right to a discharge at the time of filing his petition. Such a right could be acquired only by proving, at the time of applying for a certificate of discharge, that he had in all respects complied with the provisions of statutes 1838 and 1841 (the latter of which was passed after he had been adjudged an insolvent), by which only a right could be acquired. The latter statute, therefore, is not to be considered a retrospective act, disturbing vested rights, but as altogether prospective in its operation, although it (the discharge) might depend, in some case, upon acts done before it took effect." 3 Met. 215.

The statute in ex parte Lane was much more like a retrospective act than is that of 1874, because it actually deprived the insolvent of a discharge for a preference given before the act went into operation. This law neither creates new frauds nor relieves a bankrupt from the consequences of any which he has committed, but merely lightens somewhat the arbitrary conditions before imposed on honest bankrupts as a preliminary to obtaining a certificate. Such a law is always held to be remedial. In re Billing, 2 B. R., 161; Revere v. Newell, 4 Cush. 587.

It is said that one section of the amended act explicitly declares its applicability to pending cases, and another limits itself to cases begun after a certain day. This is true of those sections. But most of the sections leave the matter to interpretation, and must be judged by the subject-matter. Thus, section fourteen says that all proceedings may be discontinued on the assent of a majority of the creditors. There can be no doubt that this covers all cases, whether begun before or after June 22. To settle a case in that way may disappoint some hopes of creditors, but it is remedial, and disturbs no vested rights. So of the section now under consideration. The words seem plain to my apprehension; and the cases cited show how such laws have usually been understood.

I do not mean that there may not be many pending cases which have passed the stage at which the law would be applicable to them, in which, for instance, the debtor or the creditors may have been already entitled to a decree, which only remained to be formally pronounced when the new law went into operation. But, speaking generally, I say that the law was prospective, and applied to all cases in which the actual right had not been acquired, and that all inconsistent acts are unconditionally repealed.

A much more difficult question, in my judgment, may arise in respect to voluntary cases, namely, whether the assent referred to is that of the given number and value of all creditors who have proved their debts, or only of those to whom the bankrupt is liable as principal debtor; but as this is a compulsory case, that point need not be decided now. DISCHARGE GRANTED.

NOTE.—The difficulty which the learned judge suggests, arising out of voluntary cases, is solved by Mr. District Judge Hopkins, in the following opinion.

III. In re PERKINS et al.

United States District Court, Western District of Wisconsin, September 26, 1874.

Before Hon. JAMES C. HOPKINS, District Judge.

1. Discharge of Bankrupt—Amount of Assets—Consent of Creditors.—From the fact that section 9 of the amendatory bankrupt act of 1874 repeals the provision of section 33 of the original act, which prohibits the discharge of the bankrupt unless his assets pay fifty per cent. of the debts proved against his estate, or unless a majority in number and value of his creditors consent; and from the further fact that this repeal carries with it the repeal of section 1 of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 227), and also of section 1 of the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 276), by which section 33 of the original act was amended; and from the further fact that the remaining provisions of section 9 of the amendatory act of 1874, which provide that in cases of compulsory bankruptcy, the bankrupt shall be entitled to his discharge without reference to the amount of his assets or the consent of his creditors, and that in cases of involuntary bankruptcy, the bankrupt shall not be entitled to his discharge unless his assets shall be equal to thirty per centum of the debts, or unless he shall have the consent of one-fourth in number and one-third in value of his creditors,—are prospective only and do not apply to pending cases;—it is held, that bankrupts, both in voluntary and compulsory cases commenced before the 22d day of June, 1874, may be discharged, without reference to the question of the amount of assets, or the number of creditors assenting, provided they comply with the law in other respects. [Affirming in part, and denying in part, re Franke, 6 Chi. Leg. News, 414.]

2. ———. Effect of Debts Contracted Before the First of January, 1869.—But although the acts of 1868 and 1871 (above stated) may not be repealed, yet as to debts contracted before the 1st day of January, 1869, the bankrupt is entitled to his discharge without reference to the amount of his assets. [Acc. Re Franke, 6 Chi. Leg. News, 414.]

3. ———. Effect of Renewal Notes.—In fixing the time when the debt was contracted, if notes have been given in renewal of other notes, the debt will be deemed to have been contracted from the date of the original transaction, and not from the date of the renewal notes.

3. ——. ——. Security Debts.—Where the debtors opposing the discharge were sureties on the original notes made before the 1st day of January, 1869, as well as upon the renewal notes made since that date, they do not (whichever way the statute be construed) occupy a position to insist on the payment of any portion of the debt of their principal (a voluntary bankrupt) before he can be discharged.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Cassody & Carpenter and Geo. B. Smith, for bankrupts; Orton, Keyes & Chynewoth, for creditors.

HOPKINS, J.—The above named bankrupts, who were adjudged such, on their own petition, in March, 1873, in January last filed a petition for their discharge. Parker & Stone, two of their creditors opposed it, on the ground: 1st, that their assets did not amount to 50 per cent. of their debts; and, 2d, that they had not the assent of a sufficient number of their creditors. These objections, although filed before the recent amendments, were not brought to a hearing until after; and, as a matter of course, the first question which arose was as to the effect of those amendments. The counsel for the creditors claimed that the amendments applied and had changed the prior conditions upon which a discharge might be granted, and maintained that under section 9, of the act of June 22, 1874, these bankrupts, as these proceedings were voluntary, could not be discharged unless their assets were equal to 30 per cent. of their debts, or the prescribed number of their creditors had filed their consent thereto; that the other exceptions in section 33 of the original act, as amended, were repealed, and that it was now immaterial when the debts were contracted; that no discharge could now be granted unless the assets equaled 30 per cent. of all debts.

These various positions were controverted by the bankrupts' counsel. So it becomes necessary, first to determine whether the provisions of section 9 of the act of 1074, apply to cases pending, where an adjudication had been made before that act passed. On this question I am assisted by the opinion of Judge Blatchford in re Franke, 6 Chi. Leg. News, 414. In that case he holds that this section (9) is prospective only, that its provisions do not apply to pending cases, and, that the provisions upon the same subject in the prior acts, are not repealed by section 21 of the act of 1874, as to pending cases, because (he says) the provisions (of section 9), "have reference only to cases commenced after the passage of the act of 1874."

The conclusion that section 21 does not repeal the prior statutes as to pending cases, is incontrovertible, provided section 9 does not apply to such cases, for there would be no inconsistency between the acts unless they both applied to the same case or cases. So when it is settled that the last act refers only to future cases, it follows as a necessary sequence that the former acts are not repealed as to pending cases. I fully concur with the learned judge in his interpretation of the amended act, and agree with him that the provisions of the 9th section apply only to cases commenced after its passage. His views are in accord with those I expressed in Hamlin v. Pettibone, 1 vol. Central Law Journal, page 404, same case, 10, N. B. R. 173, in construing another provision of the act of 1874. I held in that case that section eleven applied to cases commenced after the passage of the act, and was not intended to apply to cases pending when passed, so as to make contracts valid that were void by the terms of the prior statutes (Hackly v. Sprague, 10 Wend. 113; Morton v. Rutherford, 8 Wis. 298; 2 Wis. 2371;) and that the repealing clause in section twenty-one was inoperative, except as to cases where the provisions of the amended act applied, and that as those provisions, then under consideration, did not apply to pending cases, the prior statutes were in force and unaffected by the repealing clause of the amended act.

The learned judge, in his opinion, referred to section 17, not noticed by me, as bearing upon the question as to what cases Congress intended the provisions of the amended act to apply. In that section it is enacted that "its provisions shall apply to cases of bankruptcy now pending or to be hereafter pending," from which, as well as from sections 10 and 12, it is fair to infer that the general provisions of the act were not intended to apply to pending cases. The general rule is that statutes are to have a prospective operation. In Harvey v. Tyler, 2 Wallace, 347, it is said "that it is a rule of construction that all statutes are to be considered prospective, unless the language is express to the contrary, or there is a necessary implication to that effect." And in United States v. Heth, 3 Cranch, 413, that "words in a statute ought not to have a retrospective operation, unless they are so clear, strong, and imperative that no other meaning can be annexed to them, or unless the intent of the legislation cannot be otherwise satisfied. Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wallace, 596. The act of 1874, construed according to these rules, must be held to apply to future cases except when otherwise provided.

If this was all there was of the 9th section, I should hold that the provisions of the prior law in reference to the conditions upon which a discharge could be granted, were still in force. This section, in the first place, provides, that in involuntary cases, the provisions of the original act, and of the amendments and supplements thereto, requiring the payment of any proportion of the debts by the bankrupt as a condition of his discharge, shall not apply, but that he may be discharged the same as if he had paid the required amount or had procured the consent of the requisite number of his creditors thereto.

But these provisions, according to our construction, only apply to cases commenced after the passage of the act, and do not authorize a court to order a discharge in pending cases without a compliance with the provisions of the prior statutes.

The next provision of the section (9) applies to voluntary cases, and reduces the value of assets from fifty to thirty per cent. and the proportion of creditors from one-half to one-fourth, to entitle a party to a discharge.

But this provision, like the preceeding one, only applies to future cases and does not affect the law as to existing cases. If this were all there was of the section, I should have no hesitancy in holding that the power of the court in granting discharges in pending cases was not changed. But it is not all. After prescribing these new conditions as to future cases, it reads, "and the provision of section 33 of said act of March 2, 1867, requiring fifty per cent. of such assets is hereby repealed." This cannot be treated as mere tautology. It must have some significance. It is true that section 33 had been amended by the act of July 27, 1868, 15, U. S. Stat. at L. 227, by inserting, among other things, in lieu of the word "pay," the words "equal to," but the fifty per cent. clause was retained.

The same section was further amended by the act of July 14, 1870, 16, id. 276, by declaring that the second clause of section 33, of the act of 1867, as amended by the act of 1868, should not apply to debts contracted prior to the first day of January, 1869.

Now, it seems to me that the obvious intention of this repealing clause in section 9, was to repeal the existing law requiring assets of the value of fifty per cent. of debts as a condition of obtaining a discharge. Unless this was the intention of Congress, the clause is destitute of meaning or operation. It is an express repeal of the provision of what was evidently supposed by Congress to be the law. It is different from the repealing clause in section 21, which depends wholly upon repugnancy. Judge Blatchford construed it as only repealing the section as originally passed, leaving the act of 1868 amending it in force. I think such construction too strict, and as not carrying out the palpable intention of Congress. It virtually nullifies the whole effect of the clause.

Technically, the 33d section of the act of 1867, in such respects as it had been changed by the amendatory act of 1868, had been repealed; so that unless the clause can be construed as embracing not only the original section and its amendments or "the section as amended," as it is spoken of in the act of July 14, 1870, it really has no significance or operation.

Digitized by Google

It was unnecessary to insert such a clause for the purpose of giving effect to the 30 per cent. clause which preceded it, for that being inconsistent with the 50 per cent. clause in the prior statutes, was repealed by implication, so that unless it repealed the 50 per cent. requirement in the prior acts, I do not see that any effect can be given to it, which is contrary to all rules governing the construction of statutes. It is uniformly held to be the duty of courts to so construe a statute as to give effect to every part and clause if possible, and in this case effect can only be given to this clause, by holding that the repeal covers the 50 per cent. clause in the original section, and in the amendments of 1868.

I am, therefore, constrained to differ with the learned judge upon the meaning of this repealing clause, and must hold that the repeal of the provision, "requiring 50 per centum of such assets," applies to the amendatory act of 1868, as well as to the act of 1867.

The changes made by the act of 1874 are clearly in the interest of the debtor, and may be regarded as a disapproval by Congress of the energetic provisions of the original act as to him, and as expressive of its intention to relieve him of many of its requirements, among which the conditions imposed upon his obtaining a discharge, were perhaps the most embarassing. Having been often needlessly thrown into bankruptcy and ruined in business, it was not unnatural to increase the facilities for his discharge, by authorizing the court to order a discharge without reference to the amount of his assets in cases theretofore commenced. As the creditor had previously possessed great facilities for proceeding against him, it is apparent that Congress meant to give him increased facilities to obtain his rights, a discharge. This seems to be the spirit and meaning of the act of 1874; and I therefore hold that parties in both voluntary and involuntary cases, commenced before the 22d of June, 1874, may be discharged without reference to the question of the amount of assets, or the number of creditors assenting, provided they comply with the law in other respects.

But if I am wrong in this view, there is another answer to the objections interposed. If the statutes of 1868 and 1870 are in force, they do not include debts contracted before the 1st day of January, 1869. The claims proved up by the creditors opposing the discharge, are upon notes dated since that time, but the evidence, on the hearing, showed that they were given in renewal of notes given for a debt contracted before the 1st day of January, 1869. Now when was the debt contracted—when the renewal notes were given or when the liability was incurred? Notes are but the evidence of a debt, and the holder may surrender them and recover on the original consideration at his option. They are presumptively but an extension of the time of payment. Cole v, Sacket, 1 Hill, 516. The Kimbal, 3 Wallace, 37. The relation of debtor and creditor is considered for remedial purpose as having existed from the origin of the liability, and on application for a discharge, a bankrupt should be allowed to show when the debt originated or was contracted, and if before the 1st of January, 1869, I don't think a note given after that time would bring it within the category of a debt contracted after that date.

But it is insisted that this is not a complete answer to the objection, as the opposing creditors, Parker & Stone were sureties for the bankrupts upon the notes, and have paid them and proved their claims as sureties thereon. This is so, but the evidence shows also that they were sureties upon the original notes given before the 1st of January, 1869. The proof also shows that they did not pay until after January, 1869, and that they have proved their claim, as of the date of payment, and they insist that as between them and the bankrupts the debt must be considered as contracted at that time.

Section 19 of the bankrupt act authorizes sureties, endorsers and persons liable for the bankrupt, to prove the debt for which they are liable, when not proven by the creditor, without first paying it, and such debts being provable are released by the discharge. Now does the payment change the relation of the parties? A. surely cannot sue his principal at law until he has paid, and in such case, the suit is not upon the note but for money paid at the request of the principal. But the contract that the principal will pay the surety, if he has to pay the debt, arises at the time of making the instrument. The promise is implied from the request and signing. The obligation of the principal arises when the surety becomes liable for his debt. Stedman v. Martine, 15 East, 427. The surety's right of action is not complete until he pays; so the statute of limitation does not begin to run until that time. This liability of the principal is recognized by the bankrupt act in the provision that allows him to prove the claim before payment. I therefore hold that within the meaning of the bankrupt act, the liability of the principal to his surety must be considered as having been contracted when the instrument was signed.

This conclusion is supported by the cases of Mace v. Wells, 7 Howard, U. S. R. 272; Baker v. Vasse, 1 Cranch, C. C. R. 194; Craft v. Morse, 4 Comstock, 604, and Van Landan v. Coribie, 8 Taunt. 550, 3 B. & Ald. 13. As in this case the signing was before January 1, 1869, it necessarily follows that the opposing creditors do not occupy a position to insist upon payment of any portion of their debt before it can be discharged. Their objections are overruled and DISCHARGE ORDERED.

Taking Land for Railroads—Ejectment on Failure to Pay Damages—Waiver—Estoppel.

PROVOST v. CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Present, Hon. WASH. ADAMS, " DAVID WAGNER, " W. B. NAPTON, " H. M. VORIES, } Judges.

1. Taking Land for Railroads—Failure to pay Damages—Ejectment.—Although the payment of the compensation fixed in the mode pointed out by law is a condition precedent to the right of a railroad company to enter upon the land of another for the purpose of constructing its road thereon, yet if the owner allows the company to enter upon his land and construct his road thereon without objection, he cannot afterwards maintain ejectment to expel it therefrom.

2. ——. ——. ——. Case in Judgment.—Where the charter of a railroad company provided that if, in condemning land for the roadway, the owner should be dissatisfied with the award, the company might, after the viewers had made their report, by tendering to the owner and paying into court the damages by them assessed, proceed with the construction of their work, as fully as if no disagreement had arisen; and where a jury of viewers reported the damages at $75, and, the owner objecting, other viewers were appointed, who afterwards assessed the damages at $175, which second assessment was confirmed by the court; and where the company, upon the coming in of the report of the first viewers, paid into court the amount of damages by them assessed, and thereupon entered upon the land and proceeded with the construction of their road across the same, the owners not objecting to such entry; and such road having been constructed and public travel established over it, and the company having failed to pay the increase of damages fixed by the second jury;—it is held, that the landowner cannot maintain ejectment. By permitting the company to enter without prepayment of the land-damages, he waived his right to the remedy by ejectment, and elected to rely solely on his remedy to compel payment of the damages.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

J. H. Shanklin and M. A. Low for appellants; S. H. Corn and Thomas E. Turney, for respondent.

WAGNER, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action of ejectment to obtain possession of a part of a lot in the town of Cameron, upon which the Chicago and Southwestern Railway had constructed its road.

The defendant in its answer, alleged that during the years 1870 and 1871, the company located and constructed its road over the land described in the petition, and on the 23d day of February, 1871, commenced the necessary proceedings in the circuit court to obtain the right of way over said land; that commissioners were appointed to assess the damages sustained by the plaintiff, by reason of the appropriation of the land to the use of the company; that on the 4th day of March, 1871, the commissioners reported the damages to be the sum of seventy-five dollars, which sum of money the company paid the clerk of the court for the use of the plaintiff; that exceptions to the report were duly filed by the plaintiff, and the report was set aside, and other commissioners appointed to re-assess the damages, at the August term of court; that upon the 15th day of March, 1871, the railway company entered upon the land and proceeded to construct its road thereon, and did construct its road, and continued to occupy the same until October, 1871, when it leased its whole line to the defendants, who have had possession and been running regular trains thereon ever since.

The replication stated that the commissioners appointed to re-assess the damages, report the same at one hundred and seventy-five dollars, and the court at its August term thereof, for 1872, confirmed the report in favor of the plaintiff, and against the company for that sum, and made an order, conditioned upon the payment of the judgment, that the right of way over the land, for the use of the road, should vest in the company. It was admitted that the amount assessed by the last commissioners had never been paid. The court then declared the law to be for the plaintiff and gave judgment accordingly.

The charter of the company under which the proceedings for condemnation were had, provides, that the persons appointed to view and value the lands, shall file their report in the office of the clerk of the circuit court, of the county in which the land is situated, and if no valid objections are made to the report, the court shall enter judgment in favor of said owner, against such company, for the amount of the damages assessed, and shall make an order vesting in the company the title to the land; that objections to the report must be filed within ten days after filing the report, which objection the judge may examine and confirm, or set aside the report and appoint three other viewers, who shall proceed in the same manner until the report is confirmed; provided, in order that the progress of the work may not be impeded, after the viewers have filed their report as aforesaid, the company, after having made a tender of the amount of damages to the person entitled to the same, or made a deposit thereof with the clerk of the court in which the case is pending, shall be authorized to proceed in the construction of the work, as fully as if no disagreement had arisen.

The main ground insisted upon by the plaintiff's counsel in support of the judgment below, is that the law is unconstitutional, because it takes private property for public use, without providing the owner with adequate means of obtaining compensation.

In the case of Walther v. Warner (25 Mo. 277) it was held that legislative acts authorizing the taking of private property for public use, are unconstitutional, unless they provide the owner with a proper remedy to obtain a just compensation; and that the remedy must be an efficient one, a mere judgment against a private corporation not being sufficient. In that case the company instituted proceeding, to obtain title of land on which it had located its road. A judgment was rendered against the company for the damages assessed, and an order was made transferring the title to the land, to the company, and the court decided that actual payment of the damages was essential to the vesting of the title in the company. There can be no question of the justness or soundness of the rule above laid down. No man can be deprived of his property, even in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, unless he is compensated therefor, and a mere judgment which might turn out to be wholly uncollectable would not be a compensation. Before the title can be absolutely vested, by virtue of such proceedings, payment becomes indispensably necessary.

But it is a different question that we are here dealing with. There is no pretence here that the defendant has acquired a valid, legal title, but the point presented for consideration, is whether the circumstances connected with its taking possession of the property, and constructing its track, and operating its road, will preclude a remedy by the action of ejectment. Nearly all the American states have the same constitutional provision that we have, and many of them possess a similar statute to the one under which this proceeding was had. It is very clear from the record, that the plaintiff was cognizent of all the facts, and knew every step taken by the company in regard to the location, construction and operation of the road over his property. He made no objections whatever to anything that was done in that report, only objecting to the report of the commissioners, on account of the inadequacy of the assessment. He pursued the statutory course, by having new commissioners appointed, and his damages raised, but then his interference ceased.

The case of McAulay v. Western Vermont Railway (33 Vt. 311), is strikingly in point. There, the parties not agreeing as to the price of the land, the defendants procured the damages to be appraised by commissioners in the manner provided by law. After the construction of the road on the premises had commenced, the plaintiff appealed from the award of the commissioners, and a reappraisal took place by other commissioners appointed by the court. The road was completed and put in operation, but the money was not paid, and the plaintiff brought ejectment to recover the premises. In delivering the judgment of the court, Redfield, Ch. J., said: "It being admitted, as it seems to be, that the plaintiff had full knowledge of the proceedings of the company to locate and construct their road upon his land, before and during all the time of the construction, and that he did not interfere in any way to prevent the occupation of the land for the purpose of the road, otherwise than by forbidding the hands working on the road until his damages were paid, and that on a single occasion, it becomes an important enquiry, whether he can maintain ejectment for the land, by reason of the non-payment of his damages. * * It is undoubtedly true that according to our general railroad statutes, and the special charters in this state, the payment or deposit of the amount of the land damages assessed or agreed, is a condition precedent to the vesting of the title, or of any right in the company to construct their road, and that if they proceed in such construction without this, they are trespassers, and this has been repeatedly so held by this court. This may have led to the misapprehension in the present case. But it is certainly a very serious misapprehension. In these great public works the shortest period of clear acquiescence, so as to fairly lead the company to infer that the party intends to waive his claim for present payment, will be held to conclude the right to assert the claim in any such form as to stop the company in the progress of their works, and especially to stop the running of the road after it has been put in operation, whereby the public acquire important interests in its continuance. The party does not, of course, loose his claim, or the right to enforce it, in all proper modes. He may possibly have some rights analagous to the vendor's lien in England and here, until the legislature cut it off. But it is certain, according to the English decisions, that he cannot stop the works, and especially the trains upon the road, if he has in any sense, for the shortest period, clearly given the company, either by his express assent, or by his silence, to understand that he did not intend to object to their proceeding with their construction and operation. * * * In the present case it is not precisely a parol license under which the company claim to have built the road. The record title to the land would be complete, with the addition of the fact of payment, or the deposit of the amount of the appraisal. That is a fact resting always in pais, and being so, although a condition precedent, it may be waived by the party—in whose favor it exists—and this by parol merely. The waiver may be by parol, as well as the performance, and the waiver may be partial as well as total. If these allow, then, a waiver in fact, either express or implied by acquiescence in the proceedings of the company, to the extent of not insisting upon prepayment as a condition precedent, but consenting to let the damages be and remain a mere debt, with or without a lien upon the road bed, as the law may turn out to be, then it is impossible to regard the defendants, in any sense, in the light of trespassers or liable in ejectment."

As bearing further on this point, see the case of Baker v. The Chicago, R. I. & P. Railway, decided at this term [supra, p——]. As the judgment of the court in the present case only provided that the title to the premises should vest in the company, on condition of the payment of the money assessed to the plaintiff, of course, till the payment is made, the strict legal title does not pass. But the plaintiff was present all the time and witnessed the progress of the work and made no objection.

The company commenced proceedings under the statute for condemnation, and an award of commissioners was only given for this; plaintiff appealed, or what is the same thing, filed his objections, and had the amount raised. But he did not attempt to obstruct or in any wise impede the progress of the work. The plain inference was that he waived his right for prepayment of his damages and only intended to follow his remedy on his judgment. His conduct surely led the company to believe such was his purpose, and induced them to pursue a course and expend large sums of money which otherwise they would not have done. If plaintiff intended to rely on his rights and make present payment a condition precedent, he should have objected and forbidden the company to interfere or do any work on his land, till the question of damages was settled. But this he did not do, he acquiesced in the proceedings of the company to the extent of not insisting upon prepayment as a condition precedent, and after having done so, we do not think that he can maintain ejectment.

If, from negotiation in regard to the price of the land or for any other reason, there is just ground of inference that the works have been constructed with the express or implied assent of the land-owner, it would seem wholly at variance with the expectation of the parties, and the reason of the case, that the land-owner should retain the right to enter upon the land or to maintain ejectment. There are other effective and sufficient remedies. A court of equity would unquestionably interfere, if necessary, and place the road in the hands of receivers, until the damages were paid from the earnings. 2 Redf. Am. Railw. Cas. 2d Ed. 253.

But the only question that we are called upon to decide, is, whether under all the facts and circumstances of this case, ejectment will lie, and we think it will not.

The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded.

The other judges concur, except Judge Sherwood, who is absent.

JUDGMENT REVERSED.

ELKO, NEVADA, Sept. 11, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Rather a novel question has arisen here, upon which I would like to have your opinion. A. sues B. for $200 — in justice's court, and under the evidence was undoubtedly entitled to that much, but the jury returned a verdict for but $100—upon which judgment was entered. A. immediately gave notice that he would appeal the case, and protested against an execution being issued, but against his wishes it was issued—the money collected, and satisfaction of the judgment entered by the justice. A. then appealed. Can the appeal be sustained, and what is A.'s remedy? The appeal is all correct, except that it is from a satisfied judgment.

B.

ANSWER.—We are not familiar with the local statutes of Nevada regulating appeals, and cannot say what power the superior court has on appeal. But either by appeal or certiorari the superior tribunal should give A. a remedy, and will doubtless do so on proper application.

We are much obliged for the following, and hope other readers of the JOURNAL will aid each other in the same way in like cases:

SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI, Sept. 28, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In answer to W. F. (ante, p. 482), with regard to assigning a lease from month to month, I would cite as follows:

The lease itself is not within the statute of frauds. Wag. Stat. p. 655, § 1. The assignment of the lease probably is within the statute, though I find no decision in Mo. Reports. See Brown on Frauds, Chap. 4, § 45, § 46. The language of the statute is positive. W. S., p. 655, § 2. Though the argument that interests, permitted to arise by parol should not require writing for transfer, is strong. Wagner's Statutes, 879, §§ 10, 11, may have some bearing on this case.

But in this case there was a good executory contract (Moss v. Green, 41 Mo. 389, on mutal promises) which contract, according to W. F., has been entirely performed by the assignor, and as it would be a fraud on the assignor, for the assignee to refuse to carry out his agreement, equity will interfere notwithstanding the statute of frauds. Farrar v. Patton, 20 Mo. 81; Dickerson v Chrisman, 28 Mo. 134; Townsend v. Hawkins, 45 Mo., 286; Sugget v. Cason, 26 Mo. 221; Self v. Cordell, 45 Mo. 345.

Frauds, etc., are not in the statute. Groves v. Fulsome, 16 Mo. 543. Cason v Cason, 28 Mo. 47; Cloud v. Irie, 28 Mo. 578.

Consult also, 7 Mo. 569; 20 Mo. 81; 31 Mo. 535; 42 Mo. 351.

Respectfully, F. H. SHEPPARD.

WEEKLY NOTES OF CASES Argued and Determined in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, the County Courts of Philadelphia, and the United States District and Circuit Courts for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. ELIAS L. BOUDINOT, Philadelphia, General Editor. Philadelphia: Kay & Brother, Publishers.

This publication, of which the number on our table is a specimen number only, is modeled after the "Weekly Notes," published by the English "Incorated Council of Law Reporting." We have been confidently looking for such publications to spring up in some of the states where the reports are two or three years behind the decisions—for instance, in Illinois and Tennessee. We formerly (ante, p. 72) had occasion to speak approvingly of a similar undertaking by Mr. Chaney, being a quarterly digest of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Michigan. That publication, excellent as it was, we regret to say, did not pay the printer, and is now issued gratuitously by a publisher as an advertising medium. We hope the present venture will have better success; although we think there is less need of it in Pennsylvania than in some other states; since Pennsylvania has several enterprising law journals, which publish in full all the decisions of the courts of that state (we presume) that are worth publishing, and that very soon after they are pronounced.

The following from the publisher's prospectus will indicate the scope of this publication:

"The Weekly Notes of Cases is intended to meet the wants supposed to be felt by the profession in the following particulars: First, in regard to the cases determined in the supreme court of the state. It is intended to give notes which shall preserve the numerous cases that it is impossible to incorate into the full official reports, which shall give a succinct account of what is argued and determined in that court, in a compact form, and so serve as a guide to the full reports, and which shall give such account immediately upon the determination of the causes, as it is found impracticable to do in the more elaborate reports. Secondly, in regard to the rulings of our local courts, both state and federal. These are not at present systematically reported at all, nor is it possible to do so on the plan pursued by our present weekly law publications. It is intended to give notes of these which shall preserve the rulings of the courts in the numerous practice-cases, whether written opinions are filed or not; and shall give the practitioner information, from week to week, of the decisions of these tribunals, many of which may never be reported, because not appealed from, and many more of which it is important for him to know when they are made, many months before they reach the appellate courts. As to the mode of reporting: It is intended to give 'notes,' not full reports, of cases. To state what the court in each case held, not what the judge who delivered the opinion said. The cases cited will be given, as far as practicable, with the names of the counsel engaged. And the endeavor will be made to report all causes determined, down to the Saturday preceeding the day of publication."

LAW OF JUDGMENTS. By A. C. FREEMAN. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. San Francisco, A. L. Bancroft & Co. 1874.

The first edition of this work appeared in January, 1873, and already we have the second edition, whose value has been increased by the addition of a large number of cases. The word Judgment is used by the author as equivalent to the acts of judicial tribunals' finally determining the rights of parties in civil actions and proceedings at law and in equity. The author has demonstrated that he is an accomplished lawyer—for none but such could produce a work which displays, on almost every page, skill in treatment and good judgment in the selection and use of the materials at his disposal. The Law Reports, state and federal, show that the Pacific coast possesses in proportion to numbers, more able lawyers and judges, perhaps, than can be found in any other portion of the country, and Mr. Freeman's work is one in which the profession there have a good reason to feel a just pride. A writer on the subject of Judgments is constantly tempted to get into the field of executions or judicial sales, and if he once yields to the temptation, the character of his treatise will be changed. If this latter subject were exhaustively treated it would expand the volume into two; if defectively treated, it had better be untouched. Mr. Freeman, we are glad to observe, has rigorously confined himself to Judgments, and has thus been able to keep his work within manageable limits, and to have room to do well what he undertakes to do at all. We have no hesitation in recommending his work as one of great merit, and which will be found useful to every practising lawyer.

The decisions, down to the time when the work went to press, are very fully collected, although it is scarcely practicable—perhaps not desirable—to include them all. A judicious selection, criticism and comparison of cases is better, on a subject where the cases are legion, than to attempt to collect them all. Since Mr. Freeman's work was on the press the Supreme Court of the United States has pronounced some important judgments on the subject of which Mr. Freeman treats—notably, Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457 (ante, p. 308), and Galpin v. Page, Ib. 350. In the case first cited, the constitutional provision, and the act of Congress of May 26, 1790 (1 Stats. at Large, 122), as to the faith and credit to be given to judgments of sister states, are examined in a well considered opinion by Mr, Justice Bradley, and the sound conclusion reached that such a judgment may be contradicted as to the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction, and if it be successfully cantradicted, the judgment is a nullity, though the record of such judgment may recite that the requsite jurisdictional facts existed. Galpin v. Page, supra, reverses the same case cited by the author, sec. 131, reported, 1 Sawyer C. C. Rep. 318. After the reversal, the case was again tried in the circuit court, before Mr. Justice Field of the Supreme Court of the United States, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff, August 31, 1874. This able and learned judge accompanied the judgment with an elaborate opinion upon the subject of the presumptions of law in favor of the acts of courts of general jurisdiction, and considered with great care the extent and limitations of such presumptions. The case is one of unusual importance, and we present it to our readers in another place.

We welcome Freeman on Judgments, as a substantial addition to the law literature of the country.

THE LAW OF LIFE INSURANCE, WITH A CHAPTER ON ACCIDENT INSURANCE. BY GEORGE BLISS. Second Edition. New York: Baker, Voorhies & Co. 1874 pp. 793.

The subject of the Insurance upon lives, by reason of the peculiarities which distinguishes it in important respects from other Insurance, and of the vast magnitude of the interests involved in the business, deserves separate treatment. Life Insurance is the growth of the last twenty-five years, and in that time, both in this country and in Europe, it has attained an enormous development. The author, in his Preface, states that, while in 1858 there were in force less than 43,000 policies insuring about $116,000, there were at the close of 1870, nearly 740,000 policies in existence, insuring nearly $2,000,000,000,—a sum little less than the national debt.

In the important case of Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 4 House of Lords Cases, 483, 505, which involved the meaning of a provision in a life policy, Lord Leonards in delivering his opinion, very truthfully observed: "My Lords, I believe that a more important case than the present has not come before your lordships during this session. Because, although the point turns simply upon the proper construction of the instrument, yet it leads to such important consequences with regard to insurances for life, which are so common in this country, and upon which many persons entirely depend as their security for a provision for their families, that it becomes exceedingly important to consider maturely what is the true construction of an instrument of this sort."

The author was therefore well justified in devoting a work to this highly important branch of the law of insurance.

The practical judgment of the profession has anticipated our favorable opinion of this Treatise, by calling for a second edition within three years from the publication of the first.

Mr. Bliss is the district Attorney of the United States, for the Southern District of New York, and is well-known as an able lawyer who has been for years in full and active practice. This has been a fitting preparation for useful and successful legal authorship, for in no other way can the wants of the profession be so fully appreciated or so well supplied. His work is no doubt all the better for "having been completed," as the author informs us, "amid the pressure of an active practice, and chiefly in hours stolen from recreation and rest."

It is the design of the author to refer to every reported case on the subject, down to the time of his work going to press, and in this he has, no doubt, substantially succeeded, but it is quite unimpossible not to overlook a few cases. The omissions however, are signally few and unimportant. In conclusion, we can concientiously indorse Mr. Bliss' work as a good one, and cordially recommend it to the profession.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Alabama Law Journal for October 3, has an article on Geographical Names as Trade-marks, in which it reviews the following cases: Brooklyn White Lead Co. v. Masury, 25 Barb. 416; Candee v. Deere, 54 Ill. 439; S. C. 5 Am. Rep. 125; Newman v. Alvord, 51 N. F. 89; See v. Haley, L. R. 5 Ch. Ap. 155; Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R., 5 H. of L. 508; Radde v. Norman, L. R. 14 Eq. 348; Lea v. Wolff, 1 N. Y. S. C. Rep. 626; and finally, the late case of Delaware & Hudson Canal Co. v. Clark, Supreme Court of the United States.

It also has an article on the effect of mistakes in recording conveyances, in which the following New York cases are noticed: Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns, Ch. 288; Ford v. James, 4 Keyes, 300; Peck v. Williams, 10 N. Y. 518, and N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. White, 17 N. Y. 469.

It also has a curious and instructive article by C. H. T., on Salaries of Judges.

It publishes in full the important decision of Judge Blatchford in re Scull, which we have already noticed, ante, p. 399.

It publishes the report of Dr. J. B. Miles, the general secretary of the Association for the Reform and Codification of International Law, as to the past procedure and present position of the conference.

It reports a case determined in the English Queen's Bench—Taylor v. The Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company. In this case the plaintiffs shipped on board the defendants' ship at Liverpool for New York certain boxes of diamonds, under bills of lading, excepting amongst other things, "robbers, thieves, barratry of the masters and mariners," and containing a clause that "the ship owner is not liable for any damage to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance." One of the boxes of diamonds was stolen when on board the ship either on the voyage or after her arrival in port, before the time for delivery arrived, but there was no evidence to show whether they were stolen by one of the crew, or by a passenger, or after her arrival, by some person from the shore. Held 1. That "damage to any goods" in the insurance clause did not apply to the case of a total abstraction of the goods; 2. That the word "thieves" applied, as in policies of insurance, only to thieves external to the ship, and not to a passenger or one of the crew; 3. That the onus of showing that the loss came within one of the exceptions lay upon the shipowners, and not the shipper; and that, as the defendants had failed in showing that, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Our excellent contemporary, the Chicago Legal News, has had a strike among its printers, owing to a disagreement about paying full price of composition for blank pages in the printing of briefs. The proprietors refused to pay this, and hence a strike, 45 printers putting on their coats. In three hours the plucky and energetic president of the News Printing Company had their places supplied by non-union printers or "rats," and the journal comes out on time, looking as well as usual, and with four extra pages.

The present number of the Legal News (Oct 5) publishes re Perkins, which we also publish elsewhere.

In re Atkinson, Mr. District Judge Nelson, District of Minnesota, rules that an assignee in bankruptcy may settle an indebtedness of the partnership, by cancelling a debt due from the same person to the separate estate of one of the members, placing the proceeds to the proper account; that if the claim is disputed, and is one that has been returned in the schedules, assignee may retain in his possession, until the final decision, as much of the proceeds which would otherwise belong to the creditor of the partnership as is necessary to satisfy the debt due from the partnership creditor to the separate estate of one of the members.

In Brooke v. McCracken, Mr. District Judge Deady, District of Oregon, holds that the action given to the assignee by Sec. 35 of the bankrupt act to recover property or the value thereof, transferred contrary to such section, is within the jurisdiction conferred upon the Circuit Court by Sec. 2 of said act prior to the amendment of June 22, 1874; and that the amendments of june 22, 1874, to Sec. 35 of the bankrupt act are not retroactive. This opinion affirms Hamlin v. Pittibone, ante, p. 404.

The case of the Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Village of Hyde Park, Supreme Court of Illinois (Walker, J.) is an able opinion on the power of courts to abate a nuisance, although the nuisance is committed in carrying on business authorized by the charter of a corporation. The court hold that the charter of a corporation cannot confer the right to commit a crime.

In Michigan State Insurance Co. v. Lewis, the Supreme Court of Michigan, (Mr. Justice Cooley) rule an interesting point in fire insurance. The plaintiff made application for insurance and told the agent of the company that the incumbrance on the property was a mortgage of near $5,300 and said nothing about the accrued interest, and the mortgage was for $325 more, and the agent filled out the application stating the mortgage to be for that amount; held, that this was not such a misrepresentation as would make the policy void; nor was the policy annulled by the commencement of foreclosure proceedings.

Voris v. Sloan, Supreme Court of Illinois, is a case where land was settled upon trustees for the benefit of a female and the heirs of her body. She married and had two children. The husband having died, she and her children were reduced to extreme poverty. The property could not be rented, by reason of the uncertainty of the tenure. They could not pay the taxes, nor could the trustees, who had already advanced some $900 for this purpose, advance any more. Held, that this was a case where a court of equity would break in upon the terms of the trust and sell the land.

Gage v. Lewis is an interesting decision of the same court, involving the law in regard to fraudulent representatjons.

The Western Jurist, for September, (Mills & Co., Des Moines, Iowa), has an able article on Monopolies—Railroads—National Banks. It has two articles on the subject of an elective judiciary. Another article, Elements of Success in a Lawyer, is an extract from an address of Professor Washburn before the Harvard Law School.

It reports three decisions of the Supreme Court of Iowa:

The Iowa Railroad Land Co. v. Carroll county, holding that a tax levied to pay interest upon county bonds issued in satisfaction of judgments rendered against the county, is legal and cannot be enjoined; and that under chapter 87 of the Iowa laws of 1872, (page 92) a county, (or any other municipal corporation), has power to issue bonds in payment of judgments rendered against such county whenever the same are demanded by the creditor and the parties can agree as to their character.

Also McLaughlin v. Bascom, holding that where in an action of slander, the words spoken are ambiguous, they are to be construed in the sense in which the hearers understood them; and that in such case it is the province of the jury to determine the sense in which the words were understood.

Also State v. Laffer, holding that under, the provisions of sections 3636, 4426, and 4556, of the Code, a defendant, indicted for a public offense, is not a competent witness in his own behalf. And that the following instruction was correct: "If you find that the defendant sold any of the intoxicating liquors named in the indictment, at the time and places named therein, notwithstanding they may have put into it roots and tinctures, unless it changed the nature or character of the liquors, so that it was no longer whisky or brandy, or whatever it may have been originally at the time of the sale, it was a violation of the law. If its distinctive character as an intoxicating liquor was so destroyed that it could not be used as a beverage, and it became in fact a medicine to be used for diseases, and of such a character that it could not, in reason, be styled or used as an intoxicating drink, its sale was not a violation of law." And that courts will take judicial notice that the county seat where the court is being held is within the limits of the county, and may so inform the jury.

The Westurn Jurist also contains a large amount of other interesting and readable matter, mostly selected.

The Legal Intelligencer, for October 2, publishes Piper v. Baldy, U. S. Circuit Court Western District of Pennsylvania, Mr. Chief Justice Strong, of which the syllabus is as follows: Judgment notes given bona fide, and for an amount actually received, will not be set aside merely because they were entered a month before a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the defendant. Some of the notes were dated three and four years before the petition was filed.

Also the following decisions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania: Glenn v. Township of Ayr: When an act of assembly is in furtherance of the very spirit and intent of the contract, it is not an attempt to change the contract. Parol evidence should, therefore, have been admitted, under the act of March 24th, 1865, to show that the plaintiff was virtually a volunteer and entitled to the bounty.

Watson's Executors v. Stern: Where a daughter proves an express promise by her father to pay for her services, and also an acknowledgement within six years of this, she is entitled to recover against his estate.

The Blair Iron and Coal Co. v. Lloyd et al.: Liability for and measure of vtndictive damages are questions for the jury.

The Legal Intelligencer also publsshes the opinion of Mr. Justice Field, in the Supreme Court of the United States in Weber v. Harbor Comissioners, with the following syllabus, which is kindly taken from the Chicago Legal News (Vol. 6, p, 408) without credit:

That a riparian proprietor, whose land is bounded by a navigable stream, has the right of access to the navigable part of the stream in front of his land, and to consruct a wharf projecting into the stream for his own use, or the use of others, subject to such general rules and regulations as the legisiature may prescribe for the protection of the public.

In the absence of legislation the common law would govern in states which have adopted it. By that law the title to the shore of the sea, and of the arms of the sea, and in the soils under tide-waters is, in England, in the king, and in this country in the state, and any erection thereon without license is an encroachment upon the property of the sovereign, which he may remove at pleasure.

That the complainant is not the proprietor of any land bordering the shore of the sea. His land is situated nearly half a mile from what was the shore of the bay of San Francisco, at the time California was admitted into the Union, over it the water at the lowest tide then flowed at a depth sufficient to float vessels of ordinary size. That although the title to the soil under the tide-waters of the bay was acquired by the United States by cession from Mexico, equally with the title to the upland, they held it only in trust for the future state, and when California was admitted into the Union upon equal terms with the original states, absolute property in, and dominion and sovereignty over all soil under the tide-waters within her limits passed to the state, with the right to dispose of the title to any part of said soils, subject only to the paramount right of navigation over the waters, so far as such navigation might be required by the necessities of commerce with foreign nations or among the several states.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE Supreme Court of California has pronounced the local option law of that state unconstitutional.

THE governor of Missori nas appointed Edward A. Lewis, Esq., a judge of the supreme court, in place of Judge Adams resigned.

—IN the United States Circuit Court at Providence the jury in the case of Hon. E. R. Hoar v. George Washington Bowen, being an action to recover counsel fees in the Jumel cases, returned a verdict for the defendant.

—THE Supreme Court of Illinois has decided that mandamus will not lie compelling the Illinois Central Railroad Company to sell the lands donated them by the general government.

—ALL the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, will be in attendance at the opening of the court, October 12, and will commence on the docket, preparations for which are now being made by the officers of the court.

—THE Attorney General decides that under the act of June 20, 1874, providing for a redistribution of currency, the Comptroller of the Currency must rely upon requisitions upon States having an excess of circulating notes to make up the deficiencies to the States having less than their due proportion of currency, and that circulation is to be issued to the deficient States as applications are made, and to supply the amount so issued. Requisitions are then to be made upon the States having an excess.

—HON. ANDREW G. MILLER Formerly United States District Judge for the District of Wisconsin, died recently in Milwaukee. Judge Miller occupied a seat on the federal judicial bench with marked ability for thirty-five years. As an admiralty judge he had but few superiors. Judge Miller was born in Pennsylvania, where his youth and early manhood were passed. He went to Milwaukee in 1838 as a territorial judge, under appointment of President Van Buren. In 1845 President Polk appointed him district judge of Wisconsin, and that position he held until January last, when he resigned under the new law of Coneress.

—JOSEPH H. BRADLEY, Esq., who was suspended from the roll of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in 1867, has been readmitted. It will be recollected that a difficulty sprung up between Mr. Bradley and Judge Fisher, when the latter was presiding in the Criminal Court in 1867, and Mr. Bradley was defending John H. Surratt on a charge of conspiracy against the United States at the time Mr. Lincoln was assassinated, and that Mr. Bradley challenged Judge Fisher to fight a duel, and that it was for this act Mr. Bradley's name was stricken from the roll of attorneys. Mr. Durant having moved for Mr. Bradley's readmission, Chief Justice Cartter said he saw no reason why what had passed between Messrs. Bradley and Fisher should not be forgotten. He thought there was no good reason to believe that an enmity still existed, and he would say that Mr. Bradley's name would be restored to the roll.

—HON. JOHN GANSON, an eminent lawyer of Buffalo, New York, died recently in that city, in the 57th year of his age. He was born at Le Roy, Genesee county, New York; received a good education, graduated at Harvard in 1839, studied law and was admitted to the bar. About 30 years ago he removed to Buffalo, and soon acquired and maintained an extensive and lucrative practice. He and his late partner, James M. Smith (now Judge Smith) were solicitors for the New York Central Railroad Company, aud retained that lucrative position when Mr. Vanderbilt acquired control. Although he avoided politics and preferred the labors of his profession, yet he was twice elected by the democratic party to the state senate, and once (in 1862) to Congress. A writer in the New York Tribune says: "Mr. Ganson's ability as a lawyer was very great. He held numerous briefs in cases before the court of appeals, and was intrusted with the managemant of the most important suits. In politics he exercised a just influence in the councils of his party, but never used it to aid corruption or to shield incompetency. In person he was tall and well proportioned. His complextion was light and his features were expressive of intelligence and discernment."

GOVERNMENT POLICE ON RAILWAY TRAINS.—The frequent and wholesale robberies which are committed on passenger trains on our great railway lines, are sufficient to direct public attention to the question whether the power does not reside in the general government of establishing a system of national police on inter-state railroads, and whether, if it exists, it ought not to be exerted. If such power does not exist, it is worthy of consideration whether the constitution ought not to be amended so as to confer it. If railroads and telegraphs had existed at the time the constitution was established, there can scarcely be any doubt that the jurisdiction of the federal government would have been extended expressly and fully over these great means of inter-state communication. Shall a citizen of New York or Virginia be liable to be insulted and robbed with impunity while crossing the state of Missouri on a railway train, because the latter state is afflicted with a timid and imbecile state government? The robbery of an entire passenger train on the Iron Mountain Railroad, in Missouri, during the past summer, and recent repetitions of the same thing on passenger trains on the Central Pacific Railroad, in Nevada, information of which the management of that road have endeavored to suppress, call up this question in a forcible manner. The hight point to be insisted upon is, that the citizen must have protection against such outrages at the hands of his government, and if the local governments cannot or will not grant it, the general government must.

The Supreme Court of the United States.

This court met on Monday last. All the justices were present, except Mr. Justice Davis and Mr. Justice Bradley. The former remained in Illinois to attend the dedication of the Lincoln monument, and the latter is detained in New York on account of sickness in his family. It is understood that several cases of great importance will come before the court at the present term. Among these are the so-called Granger cases, involving the constitutionality of the Wisconsin railroad law. The opinion of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in these cases has not yet been published in full, so far as we know. It is of such unusual length that it would occupy thirty-two pages of this journal, set in the smallest type we use. Next, if not superior in importance to these, is the Louisiana Grant Parish case. It will be recollected that several convictions were had last summer, in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Louisiana, under the Kuklux law, of persons implicated in the Grant Parish riots. A motion was made in arrest of judgment, which was argued before Mr. Justice Bradley and Mr. Circuit Judge Woods. These judges differed in opinion, Mr. Justice Bradley delivering a very able and elaborate opinion in favor of arresting the judgment, and Judge Woods dissenting. The case is therefore before the Supreme Court of the United States, on a certificate of division of opinion. Mr. Justice Bradley's opinion will be found in full in the American Law Register, for October, with a commendatory note by Judge Redfield. Another case, scarcely less important than either of the foregoing, is the case of Ah Fong and others, involving the right of a state to prohibit the immigration of lewd and debauched woman, brought over from China for purposes of prostitution. We publish elsewhere an opinion of the Supreme Court of California affirming this right, and an able opinion of Mr. Justice Field, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, denying it. In view of the fact that large numbers of Asiatics are immigrating to our shores, this case assumes great importance, and interests the people of the inland, as well as those of the seaboard states. A telegram from Washington states that this case will come before the supreme court at the present term.

Naturalization of Aliens—A New Ground of Rejection.

Mr. Chief Justice McKean, of the Supreme Court of Utah Territory, performed an act the other day for which he deserves the thanks of the country. American courts of justice, so far as we know, have never thrown any captious or illegal objections in the way of aliens seeking naturalization as citizens. On the contrary, the duty which the act of Congress imposes upon them of satisfying themselves that the applicant "has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the constitution of the United States, and well-disposed to the good order and happiness of the same," has never been performed other than in the most formal manner, and generally not at all. But we have at last found a judge who has felt it his duty to exercise this high function more faithfully; and therefore, when Chief Justice McKean rejected a Norwegian named Sandra Sanders, for having the insolence to tell him, in answer to an interrogation, that he (Sanders) knew of no constitutional law against polygamy, he performed an act as to which all the people (except the Saints of Utah) will say amen. Whilst we admit to our shores and to the privileges of American citizenship, all well disposed foreigners who may come hither from the continent of Europe and from the British Islands,—not grudgingly and suspiciously, and hampered with degrading conditions, as the Emperor Valens received the Goths into the Roman Empire, but with a free and cordial welcome, yet we can dispense with the votes of such as assume to pass upon the constitutionality of our laws in advance of the courts of justice which we have established for that purpose. The opinion of Chief Justice McKean in this case (which we find in the Chicago Legal News) is as follows:

McKean, Ch. J.—The petitioner, a native of Norway, applied to be admitted to citizenship. The constitution (art. 6, sec. 2) provides that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all the treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." The statute requires that it shall appear "to the satisfaction of the court," that the applicant for citizenship "has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the constitution of the United States, and well-disposed to the good order and happiness of the same." 2 Stat. at Large, 153-4. In this territory, therefore, where disobedience to federal authority is taught as a, so-called, religious duty, this court deems it an imperative duty to subject applicants for naturalization to a more rigid examination than would be necessary under other circumstances. The petitioner, Sanders, was therefore interrogated touching his obedience to the law against polygamy, and, with a manner bordering upon insolence, he replied: "I don't know any constitutional law against polygamy!" Here is an alien who comes from a country where polygamists are summarily and severely punished, who asks for the high privilege of American citizenship, and has the effrontery to deny, in the same breath, the constitutionality of one of the fundamental laws of all Christian civilization. He should be but to happy too be permitted to go at large in this country. His petition is rejected.

Lawyers' Assurance Associations.

The Nashville Commercial Reporter, in its department devoted to legal matters, has an editorial under the above caption, which contains the following sugestions:

Why it is the legal profession in the United States do not organize an assurance association as a means of protection to their families, in case of death, we cannot understand. Certainly no class of men need such an institution more than lawyers.

Generally they are poor, and when they die, leave their families in indigent circumstances, and by such an association they could be assured that their families would be protected against absolute want. As a rule, lawyers are extravagant; they live high, and spend all their income on their families. Their wives and daughters move in the best circles of society, and to enable them to do so, it requires all the money a lucrative practice will provide. There is too little care for the future. "Let every day provide for itself," is the adage; and so while health, strength and life lasts, the wife and family are well-fed, well-clothed, and well provided for; the sons and daughters are educated generally at the best schools the country affords; but there is not a cent laid away for a rainy day or hard times, and when death comes and he is torn from his family, and no provision has been made, they are truly distressed. Accustomed to have every want gratified, and thus suddenly penniless, not only mortifies pride, but it brings absolute want and distress.

There ought to be some remedy provided against such a state of things, and we have long thought a remedy would be provided. Suppose an association composed exclusively of lawyers was formed with 1,000 members, and each member was required to pay three or five dollars into the treasury every time a member died; would not this leave a sum sufficient to protect the family from immediate want, and, indeed, be sufficient, with such help as they could give themselves in ordinary cases, to make them comfortable. Such associations have been formed and successfully carried out by various classes, as locomotive engineers and railway conductors, and it has proven a blessing to many a poor man's family.

Of course the officers should get no salaries, and should hold their offices for a term, and then be exempt from the duties of the office ever afterwards. The expenses of the association would be small, only sufficient money would be required to get books to keep a record of the association, and stationery and postage to enable the secretary to keep in communication with all the members.

No man ought to be received into the association who is under twenty-one or over sixty years of age, and who is not in good standing with the profession and in good health; if any member failed to pay his dues after thirty to sixty day's notice, he should forfeit his membership, and he should not be reinstated, except in case he paid all his dues unpaid at the time of his application to be re-instated, and then only by the consent of a majority of the members of the association.

We earnestly second the foregoing suggestions. Whilst nearly every other avocation, trade or guild has its protective or benevolent union, the members of that profession which leads all others in its importance, seem to have entirely neglected such an arrangement, for what reason we cannot understand. The necessity for it is apparent everywhere. In every large city there are widows of able lawers and judges who have lived in affluence and in the highest circles of society, and who have been reduced by the death of their husbands to extreme want. Some of them are keeping boarding-houses, and some are pursuing even more onerous means of obtaining a livelihood. Their children in the meantime receive the cold shoulder from their former associates, and feel in this way the hand of poverty laid on them with cruel weight. Again, there are among us broken-down lawyers and judges who subsist in part, at least, by the precarious alms which they may be able to levy here and there upon their more fortunate brethern. The existence of these things is a standing reproach to the profession.

It may be said that a provident attorney may, like any other person, provide against the recurrence of these evils by keeping in force a policy in a safe life insurance company. But this is only a partial preventive, and besides it has serious disadvantages. In the first place, these associations pay such large commissions to agents, such large salaries to officers, expend so much in advertising, and, as there is reason to believe, in many cases steal so much, that life insurance in ordinary companies costs vastly more than as it is actually worth. Besides, lawyers are, it is believed, as a general rule, a long lived class; their lives are singularly free from the accidents which attend many other occupations; and this affords a conclusive reason why they should not pay the high rates of insurance, necessary in an association whose risks cover all classes and occupations. Furthermore, the schemes of life assurance associations do not embrace all the objects of such an association as we have in view. A lawyers' assurance society should not only pay over to the family of each member a round sum on the happening of his death, but it should (if need be) support him in sickness, and pension him in old age. We earnestly ask the attention of our readers to this subject.

Power of a State to Exclude Foreigners From its Limits, and to Prevent Their Landing, on Account of the Immorality of their Past Lives.

I. IN THE MATTER OF AH FOOK et al.

Supreme Court of California, September 7, 1874.

Present, Hon. WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Chief Justice.
" JOSEPH B. CROCKETT, } Judges.
" ADDISON C. NILES, }
" E. W. MCKINSTRY, }

Police Power of the States over Chinese Immigration—Burlingame Treaty—Fourteenth Amendment.—A state has power by law to exclude from its shores immigrants who fall within the designation of lewd, debauched or abandoned women. Such a law is not repugnant to the treaty of July 28, 1868, between the United States and China, by which the United States guarantee to "Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States," "the same privileges, immunities and exemptions, in respect to travel or residence, as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation;" nor is it in conflict with that provision of the 14th amendment of the federal constitution, which provides that "no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." [Contra, next case.]

Opinion by MCKINSTRY, J.—WALLACE, C. J., CROCKETT, and NILES, JJ., concurring.

In response to the writ to him directed, the master of the steamship Japan returns that, on the arrival of the ship in the harbor of San Francisco, she was boarded by the commissioner of immigration, who examined the persons named in the writ—who are Chinese women and were passengers—and, on such examination, declared them to be lewd, debauched and abandoned women, and thereupon refused to permit them to land.

The commissioner justifies by reference to section seventy of amendments to the political code.

Whatever the grammatical errors found in the section, we think the meaning of the legislature is made sufficiently apparent by the language employed.

It is made the duty of the commissioner to satisfy himself that passengers are or are not included in any of the classes specified in the statute, and to prevent from landing those by him determined to belong to such classes, unless the master, owner or consignee of the vessel shall give the bond mentioned.

On the argument it was admitted that the statute—thus construed—is valid and effective, unless— 1. It contravenes the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and the empire of China, concluded at Washington on the 28th of July, 1868, and commonly cited as the "Burlingame Treaty;" or unless—2. It is in conflict with that portion of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States which provides that no state "shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

1. The only portion of the treaty which can be supposed to limit the power of state legislation upon the subject, is the sixth article. This article (in language similar to that which will be found perhaps in every original treaty between the United States and a foreign power), provides: "Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities and exemptions, in respect to travel or residence, as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation."

If, in the exercise of its power, the state can exclude the persons mentioned in the statute, or require on their behalf security that they will not become a public charge, the treaty is not violated; since the act of the legislature, by its terms, applies to all passengers arriving from foreign ports, and is not made applicable to Chinese subjects alone. Whether the power to exclude resides in the federal or state government, the treaty is not contravened unless a discrimination is made against the subjects of the Ta-Tsing Empire.

The language of the treaty does not compel us to hold that such legislation as that complained of was intended to be prohibited; assuming, for the purposes of this case, that it could be prohibited by treaty. The subjects of China "visiting or residing in the United States," or those traveling for instruction, or from curiosity, or engaging in some legitimate avocation, and whose ingress may not lawfully be prohibited by reason of some objection personal to themselves, and not dependent upon their nationality. Otherwise, we should be prohibited from excluding criminals or paupers—a power recognized by all the writers as existing in every independent state. We can but think, that to give to the general language of the treaty a construction which would deprive both the state and the United States government of this power of self-protection, would be a departure from the evident meaning and purpose of the high contracting parties.

2. The question of the power of the legislature to authorize the commissioner of immigration to determine whether particular individuals come within the prohibitions of the statute, is not essentially affected by the fourteenth amendment. A clause, substantially the same as that contained in the amendment, is found in the constitution of California, and in the constitutions of all of the several states. It is a distinct provision from that which protects the right of trial by jury, and is usually declared as an alternative, as in Magna Charta—"Nisi per legale judicium parium, suorum, vel per legem terrae." It would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to find in the reports a definition of the terms "law of the land," or "due process of law," which is accurate, complete and appropriate under all circumstances. The peculiar necessities which call for the action of an officer, and whether a power was exercised in the same manner prior to the adoption of the constitution, without being regarded a violation of the principles of Magna Charta, may be considered; and if it be found that like proceedings have always been recognized as constitutional in England and this country, and if the person who is subjected to them is accorded every reasonable opportunity to defend his individual rights which the nature of the case will admit—the case being one in which the end sought to be attained is lawful—a statute cannot be said to deprive a party of the benefits of due process of law.

Mr. Justice Cooley (Cons. Lim. 356), says: "Due process of law in each particular case means such an exertion of the powers of governments as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs."

It is obvious that, to render effectual an enquiry which has for its purpose the carrying into operation of quarantine or health laws, must be prompt and summary, and we are not aware that any reasonable provisions of a statute clothing such officers or boards with the enlarged powers often exercised by them, has ever been held unconstitutional.

If the power to exclude such persons as are named in the seventieth section of the amendments to the political code exists at all, it is of the same nature as the power which isolates those ill of contagious diseases, or those who have been in contact with such, or the power to prohibit the introduction of criminals or paupers. These powers are employed, not to punish for offences committed within our borders, but to prevent the entrance of elements dangerous to the health and moral well-being of the community. If the power is to be exercised so as to accomplish the object sought to be attained, those coming here must be met at the threshhold by some official authorized to determine whether any of them belong to the classes who are not entitled to enter unconditionally. The law appoints the commissioner of immigration to that duty, and we cannot see why his judgment should not be decisive.

But whether his determination of the question of fact is or is not conclusive, the evidence satisfies us that in the present cases it was correct.

These persons must be remanded. Counsel will prepare their proper order. PETITIONERS REMANDED.

II. IN THE MATTER OF AH FONG.

In the United States Circuit Court, District of California, September 27, 1874.

Before Hon STEPHEN J. FIELD, one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; Hon. LORENZO SAWYER, Circuit Judge, and Hon. OGDEN HOFFMAN, District Judge.

1. Regulation of Immigration— Police Power of State.—The police power of the state may be exercised by precautionary measures against the increase of crime or pauperism, or the spread of infectious diseases from persons coming from other countries. The state may entirely exclude convicts, lepers and persons afflicted with incurable disease; may refuse admission to paupers, idiots and lunatics and others, who from physical causes are likely to become a charge upon the public, until security is afforded that they will not become such a charge; and may isolate the temporarily diseased until the danger of contagion is gone.

2. ——. Limitation of Power.—The extent of the power of the state to exclude a foreigner from its territory is limited by the right of self-defense. Whatever, outside of the legitimate exercise of this right, affects the intercourse of foreigners with our people, their immigration to this country and residence therein is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the general government and is not subject to state control or interference.

3. ——. Chinese Immigration—Burlingame Treaty.—The 6th article of the treaty between the United States and China, adopted on the 28th of July, 1868, provides that Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and as the general government has not seen fit to attach any limitation to the ingress into the United States of subjects of those nations, none can be applied to the subjects of China. [Contra, preceding case.]

4. ——. Fourteenth Amendment—Right of Aliens to Equal Protection of the Laws.—The fourteenth ammendment to the constitution declares that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws; Held, that this equality of protection implies not only equal accessibility to the courts for the prevention or redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of rights, but equal exemption with others of the same class, from all charges and burdens of every kind. Within these limits the power of the state exists, as it did previously to the adoption of the amendment, over all matters of internal police [Contra, preceding case.]

5. ——. ——. ——. Construction of § 16 of Enforcement Act.—On the 31st of May, 1870, Congress passed an act declaring that "no tax or charge shall be imposed or enforced by any state upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country, which is not equally imposed or enforced upon every person immigrating to such state from any other foreign country, and any law of any state in conflict with this provision is hereby declared null and void." Held—

1st. That the term charge, as here used, means any onerous condition, and includes a condition which makes the right of an immigrant, arriving in the ports of the state, to land within the state, depend upon the execution of a bond by the third party, not under its control, and whom he cannot constrain by any legal proceedings; and,

2d. That the statute of California, which prohibits foreign immigrants of certain classes arriving in the State of California by vessel, from landing until a bond shall have been given by the master, owner or consignee of the vessel that they will not become a public charge, and imposes no condition upon immigrants of the same class entering the state in any other way, is in conflict with the act of Congress.

Opinion of Mr. Justice FIELD.—The petitioner alleges that she is illegally restrained of her liberty by the coroner of the city and county of San Francisco, and asks to be discharged from such restraint. The facts of the case, as detailed in the proceedings before us, are briefly as follows: The petitioner is a subject of the empire of China, and came to the port of San Francisco as a passenger on board of the American steamship Japan, owned by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and under the command as master, of J. H. Freeman. On the arrival of the steamship at this port, which was on the 24th of August last, she was boarded by the commissioner of immigration of California, who proceeded under the provisions of a statute of the state, to examine into the character of the petitioner and other alien passengers. Upon such examination, the commissioner found, and so declared, that the petitioner and twenty-one other persons, also subjects of the empire of China, arriving as passengers by the same steamship, were lewd and debauched women. He thereupon prohibited the master of the steamship from landing the women, unless he or the owner or consignee of the vessel gave the bonds required by the statute. Neither of the parties designated would consent to give the required bonds, and the women were consequently detained by the master on board of the steamship. They thereupon applied for a writ of habeas corpus to a district court of the state to enquire into the cause of their detention, alleging in their petition its illegality, on the ground that the statute, under which they were held, was in contravention of the treaty between the United States and the empire of China, and in conflict with the constitution of the United States, and denying, also, that they were either lewd or debauched women. The district court granted the application and heard the petitioners, and after the hearing, remanded them back to the charge of the master of the steamship, holding that the statute of California was neither in violation of the treaty nor the constitution, and that the evidence presented justified the finding of the commissioner, that the petitioners were lewd and debauched women. The petitioners thereupon applied to the chief justice of the state for another writ of habeas corpus, alleging the illegality of their restraint, on grounds similar to those taken in the petition to the district court, and also alleging that they were, since the order of the district court remanding them to the custody of the master of the steamship, about to be forcibly returned to China against their will and consent. They therefore prayed that, with the writ of habeas corpus, a warrant might issue to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco to take them into his custody. The chief justice granted the writ, returnable before the supreme court of the state, and at the same time issued a warrant commanding the coroner of the city and county to take the parties into his custody, and bring them before the court.

Under this warrant the parties were taken into the custody of the coroner, and in his custody they still remain. The supreme court sustained the ruling of the district court, and denied the application of the parties to be discharged, holding that the statute of the state, under which they were detained, was valid and binding under the treaty between the United States and China, and the constitution of the United States, and that the evidence justified the finding of the commissioner of immigration as to the character of the women. It therefore made an order directing that the coroner return the parties to the master, or owner or consignee of the steamship Japan, on board of the steamship, and requiring such master, owner or consignee to retain the parties on board of the steamship until she should leave this port, and then to carry them beyond the state.

The order further provided, that in case the steamship Japan was not in the port of San Francisco, the coroner should retain the parties in his possession until the arrival in port of the steamship, and then enforce the order returning the parties to the vessel, or retain the parties until the further direction of the court.

The petitioner is one of the women thus held by the coroner, and she now invokes the aid of this court to be released from her restraint, alleging, as in the other applications, that the restraint is illegal, that the statute which is supposed to authorize it is in contravention of the treaty with China and the constitution of the United States, and averring that she is not within either of the classes designated in the statute. It further appears, from the special traverse to the return of the coroner, and it is admitted by counsel, that since the judgment of the supreme court, the steamship Japan has sailed from the port of San Francisco, and will not probably return under three months, and that Freeman has been discharged from the service of the steamship company, and is no longer master of the Japan.

The decision of the district court, and of the supreme court of the state, although entitled to great respect and consideration from the acknowledged ability and learning of their judges, is not binding upon this court. The petitioner being an alien, and a subject of a country having treaty relations with the government of the United States, has a right to invoke the aid of the federal tribunals for her protection, when her rights, guaranteed by the treaty, or the constitution, or any law of Congress, are in any respect invaded; and is, of course, entitled to a hearing upon any allegation, in proper form, that her rights are thus invaded.

I proceed, therefore, to the consideration of the questions presented, notwithstanding the adjudications of the state tribunals.

The statute of the state, under which the petitioner was restrained of her liberty on board of the steamship, is found in the provisions of chapter one, title seven of the political code, as amended by the last legislature. These provisions require the master of a vessel arriving at any port of this state, bringing passengers from any place out of the state, within twenty-four hours after its arrival, to make a written report, under oath, to the commissioner of immigration at such port, stating, among other things, the name, place of birth, last residence, age and occupation of all passengers who are not citizens, and whether any of the passengers thus reported are "lunatic, idiotic, deaf, dumb, blind, crippled or infirm, and not accompanied by any relatives able to support them, or are lewd or abandoned women." Then follow the special provisions which have given rise to the present proceeding. They are contained in section 2952 of the code as amended. They require the commissioner of immigration "to satisfy himself whether or not any passenger who shall arrive in this state by vessels from any foreign port or place (who is not a citizen of the United States), is lunatic, idiotic, deaf, dumb, blind, crippled or infirm, and is not accompanied by relatives who are able and willing to support him, or is likely to become permanently a public charge, or has been a pauper in any other country, or is, from sickness or disease, existing either at the time of sailing from the port of departure, or at the time of his arrival in this state, a public charge, or likely to become so, or is a convicted criminal, or a lewd or debauched woman;" and then declare that "no person who shall belong to either class, or who possesses any of the infirmities or vices specified herein, shall be permitted to land in this state, unless the master, owner or consignee of said vessel shall give a joint and several bond to the people of the state of California, in the penal sum of five hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States, conditioned to indemnify and save harmless every county, city and county, town and city of this state, against all costs and expenses which may be by them necessarily incurred for the relief, support, medical care, or any expense whatever, resulting from the infirmities or vices herein referred to, of the persons named in said bonds, within two years from the date of said bonds; * * and if the master, owner or consignee of said vessel shall fail or refuse to execute the bond herein required to be executed, they are required to retain such persons on board of said vessel until said vessel shall leave the port, and then convey said passengers from this state; and if said master, owner or consignee shall fail or refuse to perform the duty and service last herein enjoined, or shall permit said passengers to escape from said vessel and land in this state, they shall forfeit to the state the sum of five hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States, for each passenger so escaped, to be recovered by suit at law."

The provisions of this section are of a very extraordinary character. They make no distinction between the deaf, the dumb, the blind, the crippled and the infirm, who are poor and dependent, and those who are able to support themselves and are in possession of wealth and all its appliances. If they are not accompanied by relatives, both able and willing to support them, they are prohibited from landing within the state, unless a specified bond is given, not by them or such competent sureties as they may obtain, but by the owner, master or consignee of the vessel. Neither do the provisions of the statute make any distinction between a present pauper and one who has been a pauper, but has ceased to be such. If the emigrant has ever been within that unfortunate class, notwithstanding he may have at the time ample means at his command, he must obtain the designated bond or be excluded from the state. They subject also to the same condition, and possible exclusion, the passenger whose sickness or disease has been contracted on the passage, as well as the passenger who was sick or diseased on his departure from the foreign port. It matters not that the sickness may have been produced by exertions for the safety of the ship or passengers, or by attentions to their wants or health. If he is likely on his arrival to become a public charge, he must obtain the bond designated, or be denied a landing within the state. Nor does the statute make any distinction between the criminal convicted for a misdemeanor, or a felony, or for an offense malum in se, or one political in its character. The condemned patriot, escaping from his prison and fleeing to our shores, stands under the law upon the same footing with the common felon who is a fugitive from justice. Nor is there any difference made between the woman whose lewdness consists in private unlawful indulgence, and the woman who publicly prostitutes her person for hire, or between the woman debauched by intemperance in food or drink, or debauched by the loss of her chastity.

A statute thus sweeping in its terms, confounding by general designation persons widely variant in character, is not entitled to any very high consideration. If it can be sustained as the exercise of the police power of the state as to any persons brought within any of the classes designated, it must be sustained as to all the persons of such class. That is to say, if it can be sustained when applied to the infirm, who is poor and dependent, when unaccompanied by his relatives, able and willing to support him, it must be sustained when applied to the infirm who is surrounded by wealth and its attendants, if he is thus unaccompanied. If it can be sustained when applied to a woman whose debauchery consists in the prostitution of her person, it must be sustained when applied to a woman whose debauchery consists in her intemperance in food and drink; and even when applied to the repentant Magdalen, who has once yielded to temptation and lost her virtue. The commissioner of immigration is not empowered to make any distinction between persons of the same class; and there is nothing on the face of the act which indicates that the legislature intended that any distinction should be made.

It is undoubtedly true that the police power of the state extends to all matters relating to the internal government of the state, and the administration of its laws, which have not been surrendered to the general government, and embraces regulations affecting the health, good order, morals, peace and safety of society. Under this power all sorts of restrictions and burdens may be imposed, having for their object the advancement of the welfare of the people of the state, and when these are not in conflict with established principles, or any constitutional probibition, their validity cannot be questioned.

It is equally true that the police power of the state may be exercised by precautionary measures against the increase of crime or pauperism, or the spread of infectious diseases from persons coming from other countries; that the state may entirely exclude convicts, lepers and persons afflicted with incurable disease; may refuse admission to paupers, idiots, lunatics and others, who, from physical causes are likely to become a charge upon the public, until security is afforded that they will not become such a charge; and may isolate the temporarily diseased until the danger of contagion is gone. The legality of precautionary measures of this kind has never been doubted. The right of the state in this respect has its foundation, as observed by Mr. Justice Grier in the Passenger Cases, in the sacred law of self-defence, which no power granted to Congress can restrain or annul.

But the extent of the power of the state to exclude a foreigner from its territory is limited by the right in which it has its origin, the right of self-defense. Whatever, outside of the legitimate exercise of this right, affects the intercourse of foreigners with our people, their immigration to this country and residence therein is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the general government, and is not subject to state control or interference. To that government the treaty-making power is confided; also, the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, which includes intercourse with them as well as traffic; also the power to prescribe the conditions of migration or importation of persons, and rules of naturalization; whilst the states are forbidden to enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation with other nations.

I am aware that the right of the state to exclude from its limits any persons whom it may deem dangerous or injurious to the interests and welfare of its citizens, has been asserted by eminent judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Chief Justice Taney maintained the existence of this right in his dissenting opinion in the Passenger Cases, and asserted that the power had been recognized in previous decisions of the court. The language of the opinion in the case of the city of New York v. Miln (11 Peters, 141), would seem to sustain this doctrine, But neither in the Passenger Cases, nor in the case of the city of New York v. Miln, did the decision of the court require any consideration of the power of exclusion, which the state possessed; and all that was said by the eminent judges in those cases upon that subject, was argumentative and not necessary and authoritative.*

*The only point involved and decided in the case of the City of New York v. Miln (11 Pet. 102), was the constitutional power of the State of New York to compel the master of a vessel, with passengers, arriving at her ports, from any country out of the United States, or from any other state of the United States, to report in writing, on oath, to the state authorities, under a prescribed penalty, the name, place of birth, and the last legal settlement, age and occupation of every person brought as a passenger in the vessel. This the supreme court held that the state, in virtue of her general police powers, had the constitutional right to do. In the course of the opinions of Mr. Justice Barbour and Mr. Justice Thompson, general language is used indicating a power in the state to exclude persons from her limits whom she might deem dangerous to the material or moral welfare of the state, but the language was wholly unnecessary to the decision of the only point then in judgment before the court.

The facts of the two cases known as the Passenger Cases (7 How. 283), were briefly these: One of the cases (Smith v. Turner) went to the supreme court, on a writ of error from the Court of Errors of New York. The other case (Morris v. The City of Boston), went to the Supreme Court of the United States from the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. The New York case arose substantially upon these facts:

A statute of that state authorized the health commissioner to demand and

But independent of this consideration, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that much which was formerly said upon the power of the state in this respect, grew out of the necessity which the Southern states, in which the institution of slavery existed, felt, of excluding free negroes from their limits. As in some states negroes were citizens, the right to exclude them from the slave states could only be maintained by the assertion of a power to exclude all persons whom they might deem dangerous or injurious to their interests. But at this day no such power would be asserted, or if asserted, allowed in any federal court. And the most serious consequences affecting the relations of the nation with other countries, might and undoubtedly would, follow from any attempt at its exercise. Its maintenance would enable any state to involve the nation in war, however disposed to peace the people at large might be.

Where the evil apprehended by the state from the ingress of foreigners is that such foreigners will disregard the laws of the state, and thus be injurious to its peace, the remedy lies in the more vigorous enforcement of the laws, not in the exclusion of the parties. Gambling is considered by most states to be injurious to the morals of their people, and is made a public offence. It would hardly be considered as a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state to prevent a foreigner, who had been a gambler in his own country, from landing in ours. If, after landing, he pursues his former occupation, fine him, and if he persists in it, imprison him, and the evil will be remedied. In some states the manufacture and sale of spirituous and intoxicating liquors are forbidden and punished as a misdemeanor. If the foreigner coming to our shores is a manufacturer or dealer in such liquors, it would be deemed an illegitimate exercise of the police power to exclude him, on account of his calling, from the state. The remedy against any apprehended manufacture and sale would lie in such case in the enforcement of the penal laws of the state. So, if lewd women, or lewd men, even if the latter be of that baser sort, who, when Paul preached at Thessalonica, set all the city in an uproar (Acts xvii, verse 5), land on our shores, the remedy must be found in good laws, or good municipal regulations and a vigorous police.

It is evident that if the possible violation of the laws of the state by an emigrant, or the supposed immorality of his past life or profession, where that immorality has not already resulted in a conviction for a felony, is to determine his right to land and to reside in the state, or to pass through into other and interior states, a door will be opened to all sorts of oppression. The doctrine now asserted by counsel for the commissioner of immigration, if maintained, would certainly be invoked, and at no distant day, when other parties, besides low and despised Chinese women, are the subjects of its application, and would then be seen to be a grievous departure from principle.

I am aware of the very general feeling prevailing in this state against the Chinese, and in opposition to the extension of any encouragement to their immigration hither. It is felt that the dissimilarity in physical characteristics, in language, in manners, religion and habits, will always prevent any possible assimilation of them with our people. Admitting that there is ground for this feeling, it does not justify any legislation for their exclusion, which might not be adopted against the inhabitants of the most favored nations of the Caucasian race, and of Christian faith. If their further immigration is to be stopped, recourse must be had to the federal government, where the whole power over this subject lies. The state cannot exclude them arbitrarily, nor accomplish the same end by attributing to them a possible violation of its municipal laws. It is certainly desirable that all lewdness, especially when it takes the form of prostitution, should be suppressed, and that the most stringent measures to accomplish that end should be adopted. But I have little respect for that discriminating virtue which is shocked when a frail child of China is landed on our shores, and yet allows the bedizened and painted harlot of other countries to parade our streets and open her hells in broad day, without molestation and without censure.

By the 5th article of the treaty between the United States and China, adopted on the 28th of July, 1868, the United States and the Emperor of China recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to another, for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The 6th article declares that citizens of the United States, visiting or residing in China, shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. And, reciprocally, that Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

receive, and in case of neglect or rufusal to pay, to sue for and recover from master of every vessel arriving in the port of New York from a foreign port, for himself and each cabin passenger, one dollar and fifty cents, and from the master of each coasting vessel for each person on board, twenty-five cents; but coasting vessels from New Jersey, Connecticut and Rhode Island, were only required to pay for one voyage in each month.

The moneys thus collected were denominated in the statute, hospital moneys, and the master was authorized to sue and recover from each passenger the amount paid on his account. To the failure on the part of the master to pay within twenty-four hours after arrival of the vessel, was attached a penalty of one hundred dollars. All moneys collected from this source, in excess of the amount necessary to defray the hospital expenses, were to be paid over to the treasurer of the Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents, in the City of New York.

Upon this statute, Smith, the master of the British ship Henry Bliss, was sued for $295. He demurred to the complaint, on the ground that so much of the statute as authorized a recovery, was rupugnant to the constitution of the United States. The demurrer was overruled in the state courts, and electing to stand upon the demurrer, the case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the point was thus sharply presented to the court for decision. That tribunal, after the most exhaustive and elaborate arguments upon the question, decided that the act of the legislature of New York, in the particular case under consideration, was repugnant to the constitution of the United States, and void, and accordingly reversed the judgment of the Court of Errors of New York.

In the case of Norris v. The City of Boston, the facts were substantially as follows: Norris, an inhabitant of St. John's, in the Province of New Brunswick, Kingdom of Great Britain, was master of a vessel belonging to the port of St. John's; he arrived with nineteen alien passengers at the port of Boston. Prior to landing, he was compelled to pay, under a law of Massachsetts, to the city of Boston, two dollars for each passenger.

The statute of Massachusetts authorized the municipal authorities to appoint examiners, whose duty it was to examine the condition of all passengers on board of any vessel arriving in port. If, upon such examination, there were found among said passengers "any lunatic, idiot, maimed, aged or infirm person," incompetent, in the opinion of the examining officer, to maintain himself, or who had been a pauper in another country, the passenger was not permitted to land until the master, owner, consignee or agent of the vessel gave to the city a bond in the sum of one thousand dollars, with sufficient sureties, that such lunatic, or indigent passenger would not become a city, town or state charge within ten years from the date of the bond; and for all alien passengers, other than those already specified. the master was required to pay two dollars for each passenger before they could land. Appropriate penalties were contained in the statute to secure compliance with its terms. Norris paid the two dollars for each passenger, as prescribed by the statute, under protest, landed his passengers, and thereupon instituted suit for the recovery of the money he had thus been compelled to pay. In the state courts judgment passed in favor of the defendant, when the case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a writ of error, where the judgment was reversed; that court holding that the statute of Massachussetts, under which payment of the money was compelled, was unconstitutional and void.

In the opinions of the justices in these celebrated cases, language is also used as in the case in 11th Peters, expressive of the right of the state in exercise of its police power, to exclude persons from her limits, but from the statement of he cases, it is obvious that no such question was before the court. See note at end of this opinion.

The only limitation upon the free ingress into the United States, and egress from them of subjects of China, is the limitation which is applied to citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and as the general government has not seen fit to attach any limitation to the ingress of subjects of those nations, none can be applied to the subjects of China. And the power of exclusion by the state, as we have already said, extends only to convicts, lepers and persons incurably diseased, and to paupers and persons who, from physical causes, are likely to become a public charge. The detention of the petitioner is therefore unlawful under the treaty.

But there is another view of this case equally conclusive for the discharge of the petitioner, which is founded upon the legislation of Congress since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment. That amendment, in its first section, designates who are citizens of the United States, and then declares that no state shall make or enforce any law which abridges their privileges and immunities. It also enacts that no state shall deprive any person (dropping the distinctive designation of citizens) of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. The great fundamental rights of all citizens are thus secured against any state deprivation, and all persons, whether native or foreign, high or low, are, whilst within the jurisdiction of the United States, entitled to the equal protection of the laws. Discriminating and partial legislation, favoring particular persons, or against particular persons of the same class, is now prohibited. Equality of privilege is the constitutional right of all citizens, and equality of protection is the constitutional right of all persons. And equality of protection implies not only equal accessibility to the courts for the prevention or redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of rights, but equal exemption with others of the same class, from all charges and burdens of every kind. Within these limits the power of the state exists, as it did previously to the adoption of the amendment, over all matters of internal police. And within these limits the act of Congress of May 31st, 1870, restricts the action of the state with respect to foreigners immigating to our country. "No tax or charge," says the act, "shall be imposed or enforced by any state upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country, which is not equally imposed or enforced upon every person immigrating to such state from any other foreign country, and any law of any state in conflict with this provision is hereby declared null and void." 16 Statutes at Large, 144.

By the term charge, as here used, is meant any onerous condition, it being the evident intention of the act to prevent any such condition from being imposed upon any person immigrating to the country, which is not equally imposed upon all other immigrants, at least upon all others of the same class. It was passed under and accords with the spirit of the fourteenth amendment. A condition which makes the right of the immigrant to land depend upon the execution of a bond by a third party, not under his control and whom he cannot constrain by any legal proceedings, and whose execution of the bond can only be obtained upon such terms as he may exact, is as onerous as any charge which can well be imposed, and must, if valid, generally lead, as in the present case, to the exclusion of the immigrant.

The statute of California, which we have been considering, imposes this onerous condition upon persons of particular classes on their arrival in the ports of the state by vessel, but leaves all other foreigners of the same classes entering the state in any other way, by land from the British possessions or Mexico, or over the plains by railway, exempt from any charge. The statute is therefore in direct conflict with the act of Congress.

It follows, from views thus expressed, that the petitioner must be discharged from further restraint of her liberty; and it is so ordered.

PETITIONER DISCHARGED.

NOTE.—Mr. Justice Wayne, one of the judges composing the majority of the court which decided the Passenger Cases, sums up the conclusions of the court, as follows (7 How. 412):

1. That the acts of New York and Massachussetts imposing a tax upon passengers, either foreigners or citizens, coming into the ports of those states, either in foreign vessels or vessels of the United States, from foreign nations or from ports in the United States, are unconstitutional and void, being in their nature regulations of commerce, contrary to the grant in the constitution to Congress of the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states.

2. That the states of this Union cannot constitutionally tax the commerce of the United States for the purpose of paying any expense incident to the execution of their police laws; and that the commerce of the United States includes an intercourse of persons, as well as the importation of merchandise.

3. That the acts of Massachusetts and New York in question in these cases conflict with treaty stipulations existing between the United States and Great Britain, permitting the inhabitants of the two countries "freely and securely to come, with their ships and cargoes, to all places, ports, and rivers in the territories of each country, to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of said territories, respectively; also, to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce, and generally the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject, always, to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively;" and that said laws are therefore unconstitutional and void.

4. That the Congress of the United States, having by sundry acts passed at different times, admitted foreigners into the United States, with their personal luggage and tools of trade, free from all duty or imposts, the acts of Massachusetts and New York imposing any tax upon foreigners or immigrants for any purpose whatever, whilst the vesel is in transitu to her port of destination, though said vessel may have arrived within the jurisdictional limits of either of the states of Massachusetts or New York, and before the passengers have been landed, are in violation of said acts of Congress, and therefore unconstitutional and void.

5. That the acts of Massachussetts and New York, so far as they impose any obligation upon the owners or consignees of vessels, or upon the captains of vessels, or freighters of the same, arriving in the ports of the United States within the said states, to pay any tax or duty of any kind whatever, or to be in any way responsible for the same, for passengers arriving in the United States or coming from a port in the United States, are unconstitutional and void; being contrary to the constitutional grant to Congress of the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and to the legislation of Congeess under the said power, by which the United States have been laid off into collection districts, and ports of entry established within the same, and commercial regulations prescribed, under which vessels, their cargoes and passengers are to be admitted into the ports of the United States, as well from abroad as from other ports of the United States. That the act of New York now in question, so far as it imposes a tax upon passengers arriving in vessels from other ports in the United States, is properly in this case before this court for construction, and that the said tax is unconstitutional and void. That the ninth section of the first article of the constitution includes within it the migration of other persons, as well as the importation of slaves, and in terms recognizes that other persons as well as slaves may be the subjects of importation and commerce.

6. That the fifth clause of the ninth section of the first article of the constitution, which declares that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over those of another state; nor shall vessels bound to or from one state be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another," is a limitation upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce for the purpose of producing entire commercial equality within the United States, and also a prohibition upon the states to destroy such equality by any legislation prescribing a condition upon which vessels bound from one state shall enter the ports of another state.

7. That the acts of Massachusetts and New York, so far as they impose a tax upon passengers, are unconstitutional and void, becausc each of them so far conflicts with the first clause of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution, which enjoins that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; because the constitutional uniformity enjoined in respect to duties and imposts is as real and obligatory upon the states, in the absence of all legislation by Congress, as if the uniformity had been made by the legislation of Congress; and that such constitutional uniformity is interfered with and destroyed by any state imposing any tax upon the intercourse of persons from state to state, or from foreign countries to the United States.

8. That the power in Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, includes navigation upon the high seas, and in the bays, harbors, lakes, and navigable waters within the United States, and that any tax by a state in any way affecting the right of navigation, or subjecting the exercise of the right to a condition, is contrary to the aforesaid grant.

9. That the states of this Union may, in the exercise of their police powers, pass quarantine and health laws, interdicting vessels coming from foreign ports, or ports within the United States, from landing passengers and goods, prescribe the places and time for vessels to quarantine, and impose penalties upon persons for violating the same; and that such laws, though affecting commerce in its transit, are not regulations of commerce prescribing terms upon which merchandise and persons shall be admitted into the ports of the United States, but precautionary regulations to prevent vessels engaged in commerce from introducing disease into the ports to which they are bound, and that the states may, in the exercise of such police power, without any violation of the power in Congress to regulate commerce, exact from the owner or consignee of a quarantined vessel, and from the passengers on board of her, such fees as will pay to the state the cost of their detention and of the purification of the vessel, cargo, and apparel of the persons on board.

Street Railroad Companies — Their Organization under General Railroad Laws — Nature and Extent of their Franchises.

THE ST. LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY v. THE NORTHWESTERN ST. LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Circuit Court of St. Louis County, Mo., September, 1874.

Before Hon. GEORGE A. MADILL, Circuit Judge.

1. Street-Railroads—Missouri Law of 1855.—The general railroad law of Missouri of December 13, 1855, authorized the formation of an association for the purpose of constructing and operating a street railroad wholly located within the limits of a municipal corporation; and after its organization vested it with power to construct its railroad upon the public streets of the city, upon obtaining the assent of the municipal authorities.

2. ——. St. Louis Ordinance of 1859.—The charter of the city of St, Louis in force in 1859, gave that city power "to open, alter, abolish, widen, extend, establish, grade, repair, or otherwise improve, clean and keep in repair streets, avenues, lanes and alleys;" held, that no authority was thereby granted to permit the construction of a horse-railroad upon the streets of the city.

3. ——. General Law of 1855—Assent of Municipal Corporation.—But it was held further that the general railroad law of December 13, 1855, requiring the assent of municipal corporations to the construction of a railroad upon the public streets, must be regarded as impliedly giving every such municipal corporation power to give such assent.

4. ——. Charter—Granting Exclusive Privileges — Amendment of. — A street railroad was nearly, if not quite, completed by a company formed under the general railroad laws; subsequently an act was passed whereby it was provided that "no street railroad should thereafter be constructed in the city of St. Louis nearer to a parallel road than third parallel street from any road now constructed, or that may hereafter be constructed, except the roads hereinbefore mentioned." Held, that this law was an amendment of the charter of said company, and granted a franchise exclusive in its nature, and that it was a contract with the company, the obligation of which could not be impaired.

5. ——. ——. Quære.—As to whether any new consideration was necessary to support such an additional grant by way of amendment.

6. Legislative Grant—Consideration.—Held further, that the right granted to the city of St. Louis by said act, to make such municipal regulations concerning said railroad as the public interests might require, was a present consideration for such additional grant.

7. Charters—Construction of.—Grants of franchises from the state to a corporation are to be strictly construed, and most favorably to the state; nothing passes except what is expressly named or necessarily implied in the language used in such grants.

8. ——. ——. Parallel Roads.—Held, that two street-railroads, to be parallel in the meaning of the act above quoted, must have substantially the same general direction throughout their entire routes.

Bill in equity to enjoin defendant. The plaintiff was organized in February, 1859, under the general railroad law of Missouri ("an act to authorize the formation of railroad associations, and to regulate the same," approved Dec. 13, 1855, 1 Rev. Stat. Mo., 1855, p. 404), for the purpose of "constructing, maintaining and operating a railroad for the conveyance of persons and property, to be worked by horse-power only," from Bellefontaine Cemetery to the southern boundary of the city of St. Louis, over and along certain streets of said city. Subsequently, by ordinance No. 4371, approved March 10, 1859, and by an amendatory ordinance, No. 4467, approved June 30, 1859, the plaintiff was authorized to construct its road upon the streets at present occupied with its tracks. Its road was at once built, and nearly, if not wholly, completed in the year 1859. By an act of the general assembly, approved January 16, 1860, entitled "an act concerning street-railroads in the city of St. Louis," § 1, the plaintiff (and certain other named companies), as organized under the general railroad law of Dec. 13, 1855, was ratified and confirmed in its rights under said law: its road was built and guage of track was sanctioned; and it was exempted from carrying freight and making a report to the secretary of state, but, in all other respects, was to conform to, and be governed by said law. By § 2 all railroad tracks were forever prohibited from Clark avenue, Chesnut, Pine and Locust streets and Washington avenue; and by § 3 it was declared that "no street-railroad shall hereafter be constructed in the city of St. Louis nearer to a parallel road than third parallel street from any road now constructed, or which may hereafter be constructed, except the roads hereinbefore mentioned; and in consideration of the privileges herein granted, the city of St. Louis is hereby expressly empowered to impose and levy such tax and license upon said roads, now constructed, or that may hereafter be constructed, as the common council of said city may determine to be just and proper; and the said city may make such municipal regulations, concerning said street-railroads, as the public interest and convenience may require, except to reduce the rate of fare," as fixed by city ordinance. In June, 1874, the defendant was organized under the general laws of Missouri, relating to manufacturing and business companies (1 Wagn. Stat. Mo., p. 332, § 1), for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and operating a railway to be worked by horse-power only, for public use in carrying persons and property within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis, upon such streets in said city as should be designated for that purpose by the municipal authorities. By an ordinance, No. 8982, approved June 30, 1874, the defendant was authorized by said authorities to construct its road from the corner of Sixth, on Locust, to Ninth street, on Ninth street northwardly to North Spring street, on North Spring street and St. Louis avenue westwardly to Jefferson avenue, thence returning eastwardly on another track on said avenue to Fourteenth street, and southwardly on that street to Christy avenue, thence to Twelfth and Locust streets and eastwardly to the place of beginning. The plaintiff's road extends from the northern limits of the city along Broadway, Fifth streets and Carondelet avenue, all continuous streets, to the southern limits of the city proper, its cars running both north and south on Broadway on separate tracks. Ninth street, between Hempstead and North Spring streets, a distance of about nine blocks, is the first street west of Broadway, "and it is this relative position of these roads, between Hempstead and North Spring streets, which gives rise to this controversy: the plaintiff's claiming that the defendant's road, if allowed to be built on Ninth street, between these two streets, will be an invasion of an exclusive privilege granted the plaintiff by the state in the act of 1860, before referred to, and attended with serious damage and loss to its business."

It is necessary also to mention that, by the charter in force in 1859, the city of St. Louis had power "to open, alter, abolish, widen, extend, establish, grade, pave or otherwise improve, clean and keep in repair streets, avenues, lanes and alleys" (Session Acts 1851, p. 158, § 2, cl. 8), and that said city had no other authority over the streets, until by the act of February 15, 1864 (Sess. Acts 1863-4, p. 446), full power was vested in the city council, "with the approval of the mayor, to determine all questions arising with reference to street railroads in the corporate limits of said city, whether such questions may involve the incorporation of companies to construct such street railroads, granting the right of way or regulating or controlling such railroads after their completion." In each of the city charters, since that time, the city council, with the approval of the mayor, has "sole power and authority to grant to persons or corporations the exclusive right to construct street-railways in the streets of the city, or any of them, and to regulate and control the same." Sess. Acts 1874, p. 365, cl. 16.

The plaintiff brings this action to restrain the defendant from constructing and operating its road on Ninth street, between Hempstead and North Spring streets. The defendant, by its answer, raised the following issues:

First. That the plaintiff's organization, under the general railroad law of December 13, 1855, was authorized by, and its object beyond the purview of that act.

Second. That the ordinances No. 4371, and No. 4467, by which plaintiff claimed to have been authorized by the city of St. Louis to construct and operate its road, were ultra vires, and therefore void.

Third. That the act of January 16, 1860, was ineffectual to ratify or confirm the plaintiff's organization, and in so far as it attempted this, was retrospective, unconstitutional and void.

Fourth. That said act of January 16, 1860, was not a contract with the plaintiff, nor a grant; that no consideration passed to the state; that the act was a general law concerning street-railroads in St. Louis, and was intended for the benefit of the public, and not of the plaintiff and the other designated roads, and that it was consequently repealable.

Fifth. That the act of January 16, 1860, did not grant any exclusive franchise to the plaintiff, and if it intended so to do, was a breach of public trust on the part of the general assembly, in attempting to grant to a private corporation for a long period a permanent and exclusive right in five parallel and adjacent streets or public highways, in which the whole community had an absolute right.

Sixth. That the law of January 16, 1860, was repealed by that of February 15, 1864, and the various city charters since that time, vesting in the city council exclusive control of street-railroad matters in St. Louis, in favor of the defendant, upon the approval of ordinance 8982; and also by various other acts of the general assembly granting rights of way to other parties necessarily conflicting with the alleged exclusive right of the plaintiff.

Seventh. That defendant's road was not a parallel road within the meaning and purview of the act of January 16, 1860, to the plaintiff's road.

Eighth. That by the contemporaneous construction placed on the act by the legislature and the city council, and acquiesced in by plaintiff, it was interpreted to be a law concerning, and not for, the benefit of street-railroads.

The case was submitted on the pleadings, and an agreed state of facts.

Opinion by MADILL, J., the main points of which are stated below.

The questions involved are considered in the order in which they were presented and discussed by counsel.

"When the act of 1855 was approved, there were no street-railroads, as now known and understood in this state; in fact, they were comparatively little known in any section of the country. And it may be conceded that the legislature, in framing the provisions of this statute, did not have definitely in mind railroads to be built, equipped and operated for the exclusive purposes in the restricted localities, and with the sole motive power which distinguish the present street-railroad. But the intention of the legislature was to provide a way, which, while it was simple and convenient, should also be general, comprehensive and permanent. * * * Hence the act is found to anticipate and provide for almost every possible contingency, adapting its provisions to the wants of companies organized under it, whether their projected roads were long or short, whether built wholly, chiefly or partially within the limits of municipal corporations, or entirely removed from them, and whether steam or horses were to be the motive power." The state may authorize the construction of a railroad upon the streets of a city. If the "use of them by the company amounts to a destruction of the public easement in them, then compensation must be made to the owner of the land to whom the private use of the land results when the public use as a street ceases. If, however, the use of a street by the company for the uses of its road is consistent with the reasonable use of it also by the public, though it may be in a diminished degree from that originally enjoyed, then there is no appropriation of property in the sense which requires compensation to be made to any one." * * * Moreover, the act of January 16, 1860, "expressly recognizes this company and its enterprise as authorized by the act of 1855, and ratifies and confirms its asserted corporate rights as having been regularly acquired under the statute, and the act of 1860 must be taken as a legislative construction of the act of 1855, which, though never conclusive on courts in controlling their action on questions of this character, is nevertheless entitled to consideration and weight. It follows that plaintiff's incorporation was warranted by the statute of 1855, and that it is vested with the powers and subjected to the conditions therein enumerated.

One of these conditions required the plaintiff to obtain permission from the city authorities to the construction of its road upon the public streets. It is a settled rule that municipal corporations, in the absence of authority either express or necessarily implied, have no power to grant the use of their streets for railroad purposes. The only provision in the city charter which could have been supposed to give validity to the ordinances 4371 and 4467, is set forth above in the statement of facts. A moment's consideration of this language renders it manifest that no power is here delegated to the city authorities which can be invoked to sustain these ordinances. They take the form of grants, prescribing conditions, conveying rights, imposing duties, exempting from obligations, reserving powers, determining regulations, and contracting as to time, which are insignia only of the most plenary legislative powers. Clearly the legislature never intended, by the use of the language above quoted from the charter of the city, to invest the city council with such sweeping right to deal with the public streets.

But for the purposes of this case it is not necessary that all the provisions of these ordinances should be sustained. It is only necessary that the portion giving the consent of the city for the use of the streets, which plaintiff by its charter was required to obtain, shall be found authorized by the legislature; the balance may be treated as ultra vires, and therefore void.

By § 29 of the act of December 13, 1855, power is given to every association, formed under the act to construct its road upon the public streets of any city, upon its first obtaining the assent of the corporate authorities of said city. This provision, it must be held, gave said authorities the power to assent to plaintiff's use of the streets for the construction of its road. In addition to this, by § 1 of the act of 1860, the plaintiff's road, as located in the streets, was sanctioned. Hence, whether the "assent" of the city authorities was legally given the year before or not, such assent for the future was unnecessary.

The defendant, however, insists that the act of 1860, in this particular, as well as others, is retrospective and therefore void. But, applying the proper test, and recalling the subject-matter and the relative position of the parties interested, it becomes apparent that the act is not liable to that objection.

Upon the fourth question presented, the learned judge, after defining the nature of a franchise, and the rights and duties arising out of a grant, says: Such are the rights and obligations which the law has assigned to the respective parties of a contract of this character, and to which adverse opinion, whether individual or public, and however plausible, must yield until the rule is changed by the federal supreme court, the only tribunal in the country which is competent to do it. * * *

It is conceded that, prior to the act of 1860, the plaintiff possessed no such exclusive privilege as at present claimed. The third section of this act, upon its passage, became an amendment of the plaintiff's charter, and having been accepted by plaintiff, it was from that time forward as much a part of the charter as any one of the provisions of the original act. All the provisions of a charter, whether inserted originally or afterwards by amendment with the consent of both contracting parties, constitute the contract. And no rule of law prohibits such a modification of a contract by the parties, or requires any consideration distinct from that originally agreed upon, to render the contract valid, as modified. But even if the test insisted on by defendant's counsel, that the act to be a contract must import or express a present consideration, it will be found, on examination, that it does. By it the city might make such municipal regulations concerning plaintiff's road as public interest or convenience might require, except to reduce the rate of fare. By the act of 1855, the plaintiff had power "to regulate the time and manner in which persons and property should be transported and the compensation to be made therefor." This was a vested right which could not be abridged or impaired. The city ordinances before referred to, assumed to make a very extensive and substantial impairment of this corporate power, but as before stated, they were in this respect ultra vires and void.

This right or power, so possessed by plaintiff and guarded by its charter, the plaintiff, by its acceptance of the amendment of 1860, and in consideration of the exclusive privilege therein granted, in an important and substantial measure, relinquished and consented, might be transferred to the city council of St. Louis. * * * I think the proposition clear that the act of 1860 constituted a contract between the state and the plaintiff, and that there is expressed in it, if that were necessary, a consideration for the privilege claimed by the plaintiff, which the legislature deemed sufficient, and which the law deems valuable.

Having reached the conclusion that the act of January 16, 1860, was a contract with plaintiff, and granted the exclusive privilege claimed in express terms, the judge declined to express any opinion as to whether the act of February 15, 1864, or any of the subsequent city charters, operated as a repeal of the act of 1860. For though no repeal has been accomplished, still on this ground alone, the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief asked. To entitle it to an injunction upon such ground, the plaintiff must show that defendant's road is or will be a public nuisance, and that some special damage results or is threatened therefrom to plaintiff, as distinguished from the public generally. But no such case is presented by this record.

The remaining and final question in the case, is whether the defendant's proposed road, on the streets contemplated, will invade or impair the privilege which we have found the plaintiff possesses under its charter; for, if it will, then the remedy by injuuction is the appropriate one. It is therefore necessary to ascertain with precision the extent of this exclusive privilege.

The settled rule of construction applied to all grants of franchises or privileges from the state to individuals or private corporations, is, that nothing passes by the grant except what is expressly named or necessarily implied in the terms and language used in the instrument or act evidencing the grant. Such grants cannot be enlarged or extended by implication, but are to be construed strictly and most favorably to the grantor, the state; and, with this rule as a guide, this point must be determined.

After examining the respective routes of the plaintiff's and defendant's roads, the judge proceeds:

Are these respective roads, then, parallel within the meaning of the plaintiff's charter? That charter, as we have seen, declares that no street railroad shall thereafter be constructed in the city of St. Louis, nearer a parallel road than the third parallel street. In other words, unless these roads are parallel roads in the sense in which the word "parallel" is here employed, the plaintiff's complaint of the defendants' proposed action is without foundation. If we are to be governed by the primary and more restricted meaning of the word "parallel," then the charter requires that these roads, to be parallel, must be equally distant at every point throughout their entire length. If, however, we accept the meaning attached to the word as generally applied to the ordinary business affairs of men, and which, as these roads were to be built upon streets of cities, which are rarely, if ever, found strictly parallel, it must be presumed that was the sense it was used in by the legislature, then we understand that these roads must have substantially the same general direction. And this interpretation of the word is as liberal in favor of the plaintiff as the rule of construction before announced will allow. Can it be said, then, that these roads have substantially the same general course or direction?

The distance traveled by the plaintiff's cars in making the round trip within the city limits (for, so far as this question is concerned, we have nothing to do with such portion as lies beyond these limits), is about fourteen miles. When one of plaintiff's cars is at the southern end of its route, it is three miles and a half from the car at the southern terminus of defendant's road, and when it reaches the northern end of its route, it is more than one mile north and east of the west and northern terminus of the defendant's road. Cars running south on these roads are never nearer each other than six blocks, and for the greater part of the way, seven and eight blocks. In running north, however, they are for nine blocks within one block of each other, and to this extent are parallel. But the test is not whether while running one way they are for a given distance parallel; but whether this general course, taking into consideration the relative positions of their respective termini, and the relative positions of the different sections of the city traversed by them, is substantially the same. Otherwise, a road deflecting but one block from an east and west line, and built for the distance of that block on the north and south road, within three blocks of plaintiff's, would encroach upon the exclusive privilege of the plaintiff. Doubtless it was the intention of the legislature to ncrease the value of plaintiff's franchise by preventing the construction of roads which would create substantial and hurtful competition to plaintiff's business throughout the sections of the city traversed by its road; but it was not designed by this to create a monopoly which would suspend the power of the legislature for a period of twenty-five years, the duration of plaintiff's charter, to authorize street-railroad facilities to portions of the city entirely beyond the reach of plaintiff's road, and for that purpose permit railroads to be built nearer plaintiff's road than three blocks, and for such distance as would answer the end sought, and yet avoid the prohibited character of the parallel road. The effect of the defendant's road may, and probably will be, to diminish to a limited extent the receipts of the plaintiff on a comparatively short section of its road, from passengers going one way, but it is not a diminution of its receipts by diverting its through travel along the whole or a great portion of its road, as would be the result of a road parallel to it within the meaning of the plaintiff's charter.

The conclusion reached, therefore, is that the grant to the defendant of the franchise of its proposed road does not impair the obligation of the contract between the state and the plaintiff, evidenced by the act of January 16, 1860. The injunction is accordingly refused, and the plaintiff's bill is dismissed.

A motion for a new trial has been overruled, and the case has been affirmed in general term, pro forma. It will go to the October term of the supreme court of the state.

Insanity as an Excuse for Crime — The Ohio Statute.

TOLEDO, OHIO, Sept. 28, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I notice in the CENTRAL, of the date of Sept. 24, p. 474, you quote from the Daily Register an article on the 7th Edition of Dr. Wharton's book on Criminal Law, in which reference is made to a bill recently pending in the Ohio Legislature, in reference to cases where a defendant is charged with crime and expects to plead insanity, etc. That bill became a law, a copy of which I herewith inclose. So far as I am aware, there has been but one case disposed of under this law in Ohio, it having become a law of Ohio on the 31st of March last. The case I refer to is that of the State v. Blackburn, who was tried for murder in the first degree, in the Common Pleas Court of Ross County, and convicted of murder in the second degree. The case was taken on error to the supreme court and reversed. 23 Ohio State 146. The case having been remanded, the above law having, in the meantime become a statute of the state, the defendant invoked its aid, and under its provisions was adjudged insane, and is now confined in one of the insane asylums of the state. Very truly yours, A. H. McVEY.

AN ACT

To amend sections fifty-two and fifty-three of an act entitled "An act to provide for the uniform government and better regulation of the lunatic asylums of the state, and the care of idiots and the insane," passed and took effect April 7, 1856. S. & C. 849.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That said section fifty-two of the said act be amended so as to read as follows:

Section 52. (If any person in prison, charged with an offence, whether in needy circumstances or not, shall at any time before indictment is found against him, at the request of any citizen, be brought before an examining court, in the manner provided by the forty-eighth section of the code of criminal procedure, and if it shall be found by the court that such person was an idiot, or was insane when he committed the offence, the said court, at its discretion, shall proceed, and the prisoner shall be dealt with in like manner as other idiots and lunatics are required to be after inquest held.)

SEC. 2. That said section fifty-three of said act be amended so as to read as follows:

Section 53. (If any person in prison shall, after the commission of an offence, and before conviction, become insane, whether he be in needy circumstances or not, and whether indicted or not, an examining court may be called in the manner provided by the forty-eighth section of the code of criminal procedure, and if such court shall find that such person became insane after the commission of the offence of which he stands charged or indicted, and is still insane, the said court shall proceed, and the prisoner shall, for the time being, and until restored to reason, be dealt with in like manner as other lunatics are required to be after inquest had. And in all cases where any person has been indicted for an offense, and his attorney shall suggest to the court in which the indictment is pending, either before or after the plea thereto, that such person is not then sane, and a certificate of a respectable physician to that effect be presented to the court, it shall be the duty of the court to order a jury to be impanneled to try whether the defendant is sane at the time of such impanneling; and thereupon a time for the trial of said question shall be fixed, and a jury shall be drawn from the jury-box to try the same, unless the prosecuting attorney or the defendant's attorney shall demand a struck jury for the trial thereof; the jury shall be sworn or affirmed to well and truly try the question whether the defendant is sane, and a true verdict give according to the law and the evidence. On the trial, the defendant shall hold the affirmative; if the jury agree upon a verdict, or three-fourths of them concur in opinion, their finding shall be returned as the verdict of the jury. A new trial may be granted on the application of the defendant's attorney, for either of the causes for which a new trial may be granted, when there has been a verdict of conviction. If the jury shall find the defendant to be sane, and their verdict be not set aside, a trial shall be had upon the indictment as if the said question had not been tried; if the jury shall find him to be not sane, he shall, for the time being, and until restored to reason, be dealt with in like manner as other lunatics are required to be after inquest held; if the jury, or three-fourths of them, do not agree, or their verdict be set aside, another jury shall be impanneled to try the question; and all statutory provisions and rules of practice relating to criminal causes, which are in their nature applicable to the proceedings and trial by jury herein provided for, as well as to a review thereof on error, shall apply to such proceedings, trial and review; provided, however, that if such lunatic be discharged, the bond given for his support and safe keeping shall also be conditioned that said lunatic shall, when restored to reason, answer to said offence, and abide the order of the court in the premises; and any such lunatic may, when restored to reason, be prosecuted for any offence committed by him previous to such insanity.)

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Albany Law Journal, for October 10, contains an article entitled The Fear of Courts, in which it pays attention to the dread expressed by Miss Catharine Beecher, that her brother would not get justice in the New York courts. Another on the Nature of Property in Trees, examining the following decisions: Warren v. Leland, 2 Barb. 619; Wintermute v. Light, 46 Barb. 278; Foote v. Calvin, 3 Johns. 216; Austin v. Sawyer, 9 Cow. 39; Vorebeck v. Roe, 50 Barb. 302; Goodyear v. Vosburg, 57 Barb. 243. Also another curious article by C. H. T., on the salaries of judges. It reprints from the Solicitor's Journal an article on the Power of a Master of a Ship to Bind the Owner by a Contract for Necessaries; and contains other interesting matter.

The American Law Times and Reports comes to us with several important cases published in full. Among these are Campbell v. Campbell, to appear in 63 Ill., holding that a court of chancery in that state has no jurisdiction over an infant in a proceeding for partition, without service of process upon the infant. Without such service the proceeding is a divestiture of title without due process of law. See upon the same point, Galpin v. Page, ante, p. 491.

Tome v. Parkersburg Branch R. R. Co., is an elaborate decision of the Supreme Court of Maryland, opinion by Bowie, J., on the responsibility of a principal for the fraudulent acts of his agent; evidence touching the genuineness of signatures, and the admissions of photograph copies, with explantions by the photographer.

Starr v. Stark, is an important opinion of Mr. Circuit Judge Sawyer, in the United States Circuit Court, District of Oregon, on the doctrine of res judicata. We have already noticed this case (ante, pp. 446, 447).

The Supervisors of Knox County v. Davis (to appear in 63 Ill.), is an important case in the Supreme Court of Illinois, where a citizen filed a bill in chancery to contest an election which resulted in favor of removing the county seat.

The American Law Register, for October, comes to us with an article by Henry Reed, entitled "Studies in the Law of the Statute of Frauds," in which a great many cases are examined. In addition to its usual abstract of recent decisions, it reports in full the following American cases:

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.—Weed v. Dayton—Debtor and Creditor—Exemption of personal property from execution—Household furniture on storage in anticipation of future use in housekeeping—Boarding house keeper. Opinion by Seymour, C. J. (with note).

City Court of Baltimore, Maryland.—Strasburger v. Burk—Contracts void as against public policy—Furnishing liquors, etc., to voters to procure nomination to public office—Contracts tending to corruption of such nomination equally void as if applied to elections held under authority of law. Opinion by Brown C. J. (with note).

Supreme Court of Ohio.—Union Mutual Ins., Co. v. McMillen—Life insurance policy—Failure of company to comply with insurance laws does not render policy void—Alteration of policy by agent—Unauthorized receipt of premium after policy had become void by failure to pay in proper time—Company not bound unless by ratification with knowledge of the facts. Opinion by White, J.

Court of Appeals of Kentucky.—Graves v. Lebanon Nat. Bank—Cashier's bond—Bank not bound to make formal acceptance of—Sureties liable for default after execution of their bond—Published statements by bank directors—Exoneration of cashier's sureties by reason of false statements published before they executed bonds. Opinion by Lindsay J.

United States Circuit Court, District of Louisiana.—United States v. Cruikshank—Constitutional law—Protection of individual rights by the Federal constitution—Power of Congress to make positive laws concerning such rights depends on the nature of the rights—13th, 14th and 15th amendments—Jurisdiction of United States Courts over offences against the colored race—To give such jurisdiction, the offence must be based on a motive of race, color, or condition of servitude, and such motive must be alleged in the indictment—Enforcement act unconstitutional so far as it assumes to regulate the right of voting. Opinion by Bradley, J. (with note).

The Western Insurance Review, for October, contains an editorial by the legal editor, on Avoiding Life Policies on Account of Injurious Habits. It publishes without a syllabus, Howard v. Continental Life Ins. Co., Supreme Court of California, construing the terms of an endowment policy, with regard to the time when the premiums must be paid. It also publishes several abstracts of Insurance cases.

In Samuel A. Coombs, Washington Law Reporter for September 9, the following points are ruled by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia: A power to sell real estate for the payment of debts and the education of children contained in a will, may be executed by a surviving executor, without reciting such power in the executing deed of conveyance; provided that the intent to execute the power is shown by the circumstances of the case.

By the omission of the usual recitals in a deed that the grantor is a surviving executor, and that it was executed in pursuance of a power, such deed, though not in an approved form, is not for that reason void.

A tax deed is void where the advertisement of notice of sale contains no dollar-mark at the head of the column of figures.

This last point has been ruled in several other cases.

In Gould's appeal, same court, a crazy fellow endeavored to get an invention patented by which to advertise by captive balloons suspended (if we may use this word) over cities. Imagine a great city like Saint Louis, not only oppressed with its own dirt and smoke, but overshadowed by clouds of tethered balloons, bearing such inscriptions in enormous characters as "S. T 1860. X;" "Children Cry for Pritcher's Castoria;" "The Burgtown Life Insurance Company—Assets $100,000,000." Imagine the balloons of rival sewing machine companies contending for precedence in the sky as their agents contend for precedence on the earth. Why, it would result in transporting to earth that scene in Milton's hell, where "armies rush to battle in the clouds." The court thought the device not patentable. It lacked only one thing—a "fixed and definite organism."

In the case of Kimbro v. First National Bank, same court, same journal for October 6, the following is the syllabus:

Where a draft was issued from the United States Treasury upon the First National Bank of W., which was a depository and financial agent of the government, payable to the order of K., who was a married woman then living in Tennessee, with her husband, and the draft was delivered by the government to the agents of the payee who had been employed to prosecute the claim against the United States, and the draft was cashed by a bank in Nashville, on a forged indorsement of the payee's name, and by it sent for collection to a bank in New York, by whom it was forwarded to the drawee in W., who paid it: Held, that such drawee was liable to the payee, although payment had not been demanded on her behalf until after said drawee had paid it, relying upon the indorsement as genuine. Held, also, that the liability of the drawee was not released by the circumstance that, on paying the draft, it was transmitted to the treasurer of the United States, who acted upon the indorsement as genuine, and gave full credit for the amount of such draft in the account of the bank. Held, further, that the action would lie, notwithstanding the fact that the payee never had possession of the draft, and that it was on file in the treasury department when the demand of payment was made on behalf of said payee, and notwithstanding the fact that defendant, in paying said draft, upon such payee's indorsement, acted as the agent of the United States government.

Where evidence is introduced impeaching the genuineness of the supposed indorsement, it is competent to submit the paper to the jury, to show that it had been issued by the treasury department; and to determine if the endorsement was a forgery.

The acknowledgement of a power of attorney before the clerk of a county court, with the seal of the court affixed, does not raise a presumption of law that the instrument was executed by the person mentioned in the certificate of said clerk. Where there is evidence tending to prove and disprove a valid execution, the question to must be submitted to the jury upon all the facts.

If there is a valid execution of a power of attorney it is a sufficient authority to the attorney to place the name of the payee on the back of the draft, and to receive the money thereon. Or, if the power of attorney was left in the hands of the attorney to be used by him and he filled the blanks therein, and by that means placed the endorsement on the draft, it would be a good and valid utterance of the draft as against the payee, or those claiming under her.

If the husband, during his life time never reduced the draft to his possession, then, upon his death it became absolutely the wife's property by survivorship; and if she has not waived her right thereto, the representative of the husband's estate has no interest in the cause of action.

Where several instructions are refused, but the same points are fully given in other prayers that are allowed, there is no ground for exceptions.

The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is a good court, and its decisions appear to be reported in this journal with great fullness and fidelity.

The Daily Register, for October 3, publishes an interesting opinion of the New York Court of Appeals, Folger, J. holding, applying and illustrating the familiar principle that a partnership, quoad the creditors, exists wherever a person is interested in the profits of a concern specifically, in contradistinction to a stipulated portion of the profits as a compensation for services. The same case is republished in the Albany Law Journal for October 10.

We are prepared to believe almost anything of Kellogg, but this story bears, in the language in which it is constructed, indubitable marks of being the invention of a weak brother. It reads too much like Mrs. Tilton's testimony before the Beecher Committee, to be credited by men of sense.

THE SELECTION OF JURIES.—We take pleasure in publishing in this number an interesting letter from Hon. Robert A. Hill, United States District Judge for the Districts of Mississippi, detailing a plan adopted by Mr. Circuit Judge Woods and himself, for the selection of intelligent and properly qalified jurors in the federal courts of that state. Where jurors are selected in a manner so fair and judicious, the administration of justice cannot fail to command the confidence of the people and to conduce to the repose of society. As the subject, so far as the federal courts are concerned, is likely to come before the coming session of Congress, we should be glad to hear from other judges, and also from members of the bar on this important question.

THE AMENDE HONORABLE.—We take pleasure in giving the following a prominent place in our columns. If General Case had been more prompt in exposing the rascality of Kellogg, in drawing a salary as colonel of an Illinois regiment and chief justice of Nebraska Territory at the same time, and if his expose of the matter had not been burdened with so many circumstantial explanations, we should not have been drawn into the error of doing him the injustice we did. Governor Kellogg owes it to himself to deny General Case's statements, if he can—unless he thinks a denial would injure his popularity with his party in Louisiana.

WINCHESTER, ILL., October 17, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—By the last item, under the head of "Legal News and Notes," in your invaluable paper of yesterday, you have done injustice to General Henry Case. He has, for nearly twenty years, been a member of the Winchester (Ill.) bar, and is a gentleman, whose "reputation for truth and veracity," has never been questioned "in the neighborhood where he resides." His article in relation to Wm. Pitt Kellogg, was first published in one of the papers of this place; it has been read and talked about by many persons here—by those who have known General Case longest and best, and I do not believe there is a single person here who doubts the substantial truthfulness of his statements. Very truly, JAS. W. RIGGS.

FEDERAL COURT REPORTS.—We learn that Mr. Circuit Judge Woods, whose circuit embraces the Gulf States, has in press a volume of circuit court decisions, which is expected to be ready in January next. We also learn that Hon. Robert A. Hill, judge of the federal district courts for the two districts into which the State of Mississippi is divided, has consented to prepare for publication a volume of his decisions, provided a sufficient number of subscribers can be obtained to justify the expense. These decisions comprise cases both in the district and circuit court, most of which are final. We hope a sufficient uumber of the members of the bar in Mississippi will subscribe to this undertaking to warrant its prosecution. A volume of cases selected from the great number of written judgments which Judge Hill has rendered, will be of great use to practitioners in the federal courts in Mississippi, and of undoubted value to the bar elsewhere. We also learn that the promised volume of federal district court reports in preparation by Hon. H. B. Johnson of Jefferson City, is being postponed to enable the editor to get together a better selection of cases. These will be culled from all the district courts in the eighth circuit.

A New Solution of the Railroad Question.

The Western Jurist, for September, has an able article on Monopolies, in which it confines itself to what it considers the two great monopolies of the country, the railroads and the national banks. After showing conclusively that railroads, under the present system, are monopolies, and from the nature of the case cannot be otherwise, and after pointing out the insuperable difficulties in the way of regulating railway tariffs by legislative interference, state or federal, the able editor suggests a remedy in the following language. It is worth the attention of the country:

But is there any remedy for the evils of our railroad monopolies? We think there is, and to our mind it seems very practical, although we confess that experience may demonstrate it to be pregnant with difficulties and possible failure. It is the exercise of the power of eminent domain, upon, as it is exercised in favor of railroad companies. That is, railroad companies are allowed to call into exercise the power of eminent domain to take from the owners of real estate the right of way for their railroads—this right of way is the right to use the real estate for the purpose of laying the track and running their trains over it for a series of years or perpetually. After the track is laid, the whole, that is the land or right of way, the ties, rails, spikes, etc., become real estate, and itself subject to the power of eminent domain. Now let any person who desires to run an engine or a car or a train of cars, call into exercise this power of eminent domain against or upon the railroad company, and by the assessment of a jury, subject to revision by the courts, condemn the right of way over the railroad for his engine, car or train—the assessment would fix the rate per mile, for an engine, a passenger car, a loaded car, an empty car, and perhaps grade the price for an engine according to its weight. This condemnation or assessment might be in the nature of a general or public proceeding, so that when once fixed at the instance of any one, it should be equally open and available to all who should choose to run an engine, car or train on the railroad track,—upon the payment in advance for such right of way. The payment could be made at the station where the train starts to the next station, or to the remotest station it will reach. Under this regulation any individual or company owning an engine could haul the cars of any merchant or freighter at such price as they might agree, and the multiplication of such individuals and companies would afford competition and thereby destroy the monopoly. These individuals and companies might also own their cars and become carriers of freight as well as haulers of cars, and thereby accommodate the general public, as do the railroad companies now. In other words, this plan would open the railroads as the highways, to everybody, and they would become the avenues whereon competition in the carrying business would be as sure to exist as in any other business open to all, and thereby the monopoly would be destroyed, and reasonable and low charges for carrying freight will certainly follow.

We would not exclude the railroad company owning the track from the right to operate their own engines, cars and trains; but they should do so upon terms of exact equality with all others. The assessment of damages for the right of way for an engine, car or train, would in effect, be a toll to be paid for each mile any engine, passenger car, loaded car or empty car should be run upon the track, and for every day it should be still and occupy the side track. The probable ultimate effect of this plan would be that the railroad companies would case to operate their railroads themselves and rely upon the tolls for their revenues; leaving the carrying business wholly to individuals and to individual enterprise, and this would doubtless result in the earlier delivery of freights, the increase of care and the reduction of accidents; and in all probability the companies owning railroads would find a larger margin of profits from the tolls, than they now find from the freights, and the plan would become popular with the owners of the stock, if it did not with officers of the companies and managers of the railroads.

But, it will be said, that these railroads, under such a plan, will become, by the multiplication of accidents coming from the indiscriminate use of the track by everybody, the very grave-yards of the whole people. Will this be so? To our mind the answer is, upon principle, a direct negative. In the first place it will be remembered, that even now (except those run in exact conformity with the time table), all trains are run by telegraph—that is, no train leaves one depot or station for another until the conductor is notified by telegraph that the track is clear and he must run on such time to the next station. Under the plan proposed, trains could be run in the same way. The accidents would be reduced, instead of increased, because of the increase of care which would come naturally from the fact that the operators of the trains under the plan proposed would often be personally interested in the earnings of the train itself, and would always have an individual responsibility beyond that which they feel while in the employment of the large corporations under the present plan. But further than this, the plan proposed would soon result in the construction of double tracks upon all roads where the business is sufficient to render the doing of it difficult or dangerous upon a single track. To stimulate the early construction of a double track a higher rate of toll or assessment might be allowed upon a double track than upon a single one.

We have for some time thought that the plan embodied in the above extract (which we have seen broached elsewhere) offers the only possible way out of the difficulty. It would simply result in placing railroad transportation on the same footing as that by ocean and river, open to all, on payment of the lawful tolls to the owner, and subject only to the right of the government to adopt and enforce such regulations as shall be found necessary to prevent collisions, and preserve life and property. We say the right of government; for manifestly the principal practical difficulty in the way of this plan is, that the running of numerous trains owned by private individuals on a single (or even a double) railroad track, might result in frequent collisions; and this could only be prevented, and justice done between so many competitors, by government supervision. A parallel case of government supervision may be instanced in the regulations enacted by Congress concerning pilotage, and for preventing collisions at sea. This supervision should be conducted through the instrumentality of sworn and bonded officials, skillful in railway management, and who should be both civilly and criminally liable for misfeasance and negligence. Severe penalties should be imposed on them to prevent extortion, bribe-taking, or the giving of preference to one competing train-owner over another; and speedy and summary remedies should be given against them. With such a system in practical operation, it would be as impossible to see a monopoly in a great railroad, as it is now to see it in the Atlantic ocean or the Mississippi river.

The Louisiana Question.

We hope our readers will pardon us for again alluding to this question; but it is one which, in our judgment, the American bar cannot put aside for mere money-getting, without violating a high and patriotic duty. In our last issue we took occasion to dissent from the view taken by Hon. Reverdy Johnson, who holds that the President's recognition of the Kellogg government is irrevocable and binding upon himself, as well as upon all other persons. We have since been fortified in the view there taken, by a very clear and convincing letter of Mr. Charles O'Conor, in the New York Herald, for September 30. We recommend a perusal of this letter to every person who desires to read a clear argument upon the law of this vitally important question.

Mr. O'Conor proceeds to ask the question: "Was the original error of the President in recognizing Kellogg as governor a conclusive judgment which, subject only to a review by Congress, was absolutely binding upon the persons, including the President himself, and also irrevocable by him even, though he should have subsequently discovered his mistake? This question Mr. O'Conor answers emphatically in the negative. In the course of his letter, he says:

When one of these [meaning state governments or pretended state governments] appeals to the federal government for protection against the "domestic violence" of the other, Congress, or in its default the President, must of course determine the question, and the state government recognized by his determination, must be protected accordingly against its rival by the federal executive. Be it in reason, justice and truth ever so erroneous, such a decision must, nevertheless, be regarded valid so long as it remains in force. And it is binding on all persons and in all courts and places. Against the moral or political wrong, if there be one, there is no remedy but revolution, and with revolutions juridical science has little or no concern.

All this I think must be conceded by every sound lawyer, and from these premises some persons who believe that Kellogg was not duly elected, still maintain that the President's original error in recognizing him is of such potency, in law or policy, that the President is bound to persist in it and to reinstate Kellogg by the military forces of the union as often as he may be displaced. In my opinion the premises do not warrant the conclusion thus drawn from them.

A decision by competent official authority binds, it is true, without reference to the question of its justice or propriety; but this rule obtains only so long as the decision remains in force; and the cases are rare indeed, if there be any, in which a decision, by any tribunal or official authority, is absolutely irreversible. Courts of the highest authority, or, as it is sometimes expressed, courts of the last resort, occasionally recall their own judgments and hold for naught their own previous solemn adjudications. This was lately done by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the familiar controversy concerning the constitutionality of the legal tender acts. It is true that a court of last resort will generally refuse to reconsider a question which it has once directly adjudicated. But no proposition is better established than that it is the duty of every court to recall any decision of its own which is has become convinced was erroneous.

In this Louisiana case the paramount authority was Congress. A recognition of the Kellogg government by that body, would have bound the President and all others until Congress should itself have again acted on the subject and revoked its former conclusion. Congress not having acted in this case, President Grant's recognition had a similar effect, and bound all parties; but as Congress might have revoked its determination, so might President Grant have reconsidered his opinion, and when called upon a second time by Kellogg, he might have refused his aid. And unless, when such second application was made, General Grant still labored under his original and erroneous opinion that Kellogg was duly elected, he ought to have so refused.

To this letter Mr. Johnson publishes in the New York Herald, for October 5, a reply in which he adheres to his first position; and to this Mr. O'Conor again replies in the same journal, for October 8. Mr. Johnson, in his reply to Mr. O'Conor, supports his first view by the following forcible reasoning:

If the President, under the constitution, is bound, in such an exigency as is supposed, to determine who is the legitimate governor of a state, it seems to me to follow that when he does so decide his decision should be final. If not final, he is at liberty to change it afterwards, as often as he may deem proper. How, then, would stand the acts of the government originally recognized in the interval between such recognition and the President's subsequent change of opinion? Are such acts to be deemed nullities? Can the people of a state who may have been aggrieved by the course of the governor, call him to account for any injury they may have sustained, upon the ground that the President's subsequent recognition of some one else conclusively determines that he was not the legitimate governor?

And these suggestions are equally applicable to the President's recognition of the legislature of a state when a call is made upon him under the constitution by that department. He changes his opinion afterwards, on becoming convinced that the body was not legitimate, and recognizes some other body as the legislature. If he has a right to do this one week or one month after his first decision, he has the right to do it after any lapse of time. Are all the laws passed by the legislature in the interval between his first decision and his subsequent reversal of it to be declared void? Are the rights which have grown out of such legislation to be annulled? Are all the debts contracted by the legislature or under its authority to be repudiated? I think all will admit that this cannot be sound doctrine. And if it is not, I see no reason for imputing error to it, except by supposing that the first decision of the President, on a call of a governor or a legislature, is as conclusive upon him as Mr. O'Conor admits it to be upon everyone else. Should the President, who recognizes a governor, cease to be President, could his successor, when called upon to suppress violence, refuse to recognize the same officer and determine that some other person was governor? Suppose the President refuses to recognize the person first making the call, and subsequently recognizes another as governor, can be alter his last decision and reinstate, the first man in office? It is, in my opinion, obvious that such changes were never contemplated by the constitution.

This reasoning Mr. O'Conor combats in the following language, in which he scarcely treats his opponent with that deference which becomes the age and distinguished abilities of both:

The other set of imagined evils is, indeed, a pretty formidable raw head and bloody bones, and well calculated to affright the lovers of peace and order. It is suggested that everything done under the rule of a usurper would be set aside by his expulsion, and "confusion worse confounded" would ensue. The terrible nature of such consequences are not to be desired. But the law repudiates the assumed premises. No such consequences would follow a change of opinion by the President, and his consequent refusal to recognize a displaced usurper, whom in the honest and conscientious exercise of his constitutional power, but under mistaken impressions as to the facts or the law, he had seated in the chair of state a year or two previously. When recognized by the President, and thenceforth as long as he held in his possession the insignia of office and exercised the duties of state executive, the usurper would be governor de facto. All his acts as such, would be perfectly valid and binding as it respects all persons except himself. If he were displaced in any manner, legal or illegal, his official acts while in possession would still remain valid to all intents and purposes, notwithstanding his removal and notwithstanding any express or implied sanction of such removal by the President. The acts of a usurping interim legislature would be subject to the same rule. So far, indeed, as they were not carried into execution by the actual vesting of rights under them, they might, and doubtless would, cease to operate from the moment of the change which should bring into power the rightful authorities. Thus it will be seen that the general unwritten common law has provided a means of preserving the interests of individuals and of the commonwealth from the immaginary confusion and disorder which might be supposed to result from the overthrow of an intrusive government. This doctrine is as familiar as it is necessary. The "Law Student's Primer" mentions a striking illustration of it. "Treasons committed against Henry VI. (of Lancaster) were punished under Edward IV. (of York), though all the line of Lancaster had previously been declared uusurpers by act of Parliament." 4 Blackstone's Commentaries, p. 77. This conservative principle is deeply seated in the common law, and occasions for its application are constantly arising. Let a single and familiar instance suffice:—a usurper once held the register's office in this city for a long period. He held it and exercised its functions until ousted by a judgment of the court of appeals. He remained in the office a considerable time after the supreme court had decided against him. He was adjudged to be a usurper from the beginning, without any title to the office. People v. Coutant, 11 Wendell's R., 132 and 511. Many titles to valuable property may, and doubtless do, depend on the validity of this man's acts. Mr. Johnson would find no difficulty in sustaining them. It is true that in such cases the usurper cannot plead his unrighteous possession of the office in bar of a prosecution against himself for injuries resulting from his unjust acts; nor could he recover the salary allowed for lawfully exercising the office. In these consequences there is not any great mischief. I submit that the arguments ab inconvenienti fail utterly, and Mr. Johnson has advanced no others.

Mr. Johnson alludes to Mr. O'Conor's reference to the right of courts to change their opinions, and asserts that "it is not true that a court which has pronounced a judgment has a right to reverse it and pronounce another when the time has passed within which a review may be had." To this, Mr. O'Conor replies:

It is quite true that on a claim by A. B. against C. D., a judgment actually recovered, if unappealable or not appealable from in season, settles the right to the particular sum or thing in controversy between these two private persons, so that the defeated defendant cannot, in general, recover it back in another action. Even this is only the general rule. It is not without exceptions, for if fraud and falsehood be practised in obtaining an unjust judgment, there is a remedy. Byers v. Surget, 19 Howard's U. S. R., 308; Bowen v. Evans, 2 House of Lords Cases, 281; Michigan v. Phœnix Bank, 33 N. Y. Reports, p. 30. But the general rule of the judicial department, which I thus admit, has not the remotest application to the proceedings before General Grant on the rival claims of McEnery and Kellogg to the governorship.

Both Mr. Johnson and Mr. O'Conor seem to agree that the analogies drawn from judicial decisions should be applied with extreme caution. Thus, Mr. Johnson, referring to this precise point, says: "An analogical reasoning as often tends to erroneous as to correct conclusions. The facts are very seldom precisely the same, and when they are not, the legal results are seldom the same." And Mr. O'Conor asserts that "there is extremely little resemblance between judicial decisions and executive resolutions." Nevertheless, Mr. Johnson proceeds to enquire how the matter stands upon authority, and cites in support of his position, Knox County v. Aspinwall, 21 How. 539, and Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wall. 39. We confess that the first of these cases does not direct our minds to the conclusion reached by Mr. Johnson. The case of Knox County v. Aspinwall, and many other decisions which have followed it, simply hold that when the legislature of a state has authorized a county or other municipal corporation to issue its bonds in aid of a railroad or other public enterprise, in case the people of the municipality shall, upon an election held for that purpose, authorize such bonds to be issued, and such bonds are issued and pass into the hands of bona fide holders, a court of justice will not, in a suit upon such bonds by innocent holders, go behind the certificate of the county commissioners, or other executive board of the municipality, and investigate whether such election was held on the proper notice, or otherwise, in accordance with law. These cases rest on the undisputed principle to which we called attention in our first article on the Louisiana question (ante, pp. 475, 476), that when the tribunal, officer or board of officers which has jurisdiction finally to declare the result of an election, or to act in pursuance thereof, exercises such jurisdiction, all other persons, officers and tribunals, are bound by the determination so made; and no other officers, or tribunal can re-examine such decision in a collateral proceeding, especially in a case which involves the rights of innocent third parties, which have been acquired upon the faith of it. But these decisions, as we understand them, do not touch the power of the municipal board to reconsider its own decision before innocent persons have acquired rights on the faith of it, or otherwise, so as not to divest rights already vested.

The case of Virginia v. West Virginia, does, we confess, support Mr. Johnson's position by a remote analogy. The legislature of Virginia passed an act authorizing the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson to determine by a vote of the people whether they would remain in Virginia or be annexed to West Virginia. The returns of the elections were to be certified to the governor of Virginia, who, on being satisfied that the elections were fair and in all respects legal, was to certify the result to West Virginia. He did so, and advised West Virginia that the two counties had decided to become parts of that state. Afterwards, Virginia filed a bill in the Supreme Court of the United States to recover possession of this territory, alleging that the elections were fraudulently conducted, and that the governor decided as he did because he was deceived as to that fact. The supreme court dismissed the bill on the ground that the governor's decision was conclusive of the vote. The grounds on which this decision rests are to be found in the following vigorous language of Mr. Justice Miller, who delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of opinion that the action of the governor is conclusive of the vote as between the states of Virginia and West Virginia. He was in legal effect the state of Virginia in this matter. In addition to his position as executive head of the state, the legislature delegated to him all its own power in the premises. It vested him with large control as to the time of taking the vote, and it made his opinion of the result the condition of action final. It rested, of its own accord, the whole on his judgment, and in his hands. In a matter where that action was to be the foundation on which another sovereign state was to act—a matter which involved the delicate question of permanent boundary between the states and jurisdiction over a large population—a matter in which she took into her own hands the ascertainment of the fact on which these important propositions were by contract made to depend, she must be bound in what she has done. She can have no right, years after all this had been settled, to come into a court of chancery to charge that her own conduct has been a wrong and a fraud; that her own subordinate agents have misled her governor, and that her solemn act transferring these counties shall be set aside, against the will of the state of West Virginia, and without consulting the wishes of the people of those counties.

Three members of the court, Davis, Clifford and Field, JJ., dissented.

But this decision is only in some slight degree analogous; it is not in point. The question in dispute between Mr. Johnson and Mr. O'Conor is without precedent, and manifestly ought not to be suffered to turn on any analogy drawn from cases like the above. To our mind, the only substantial argument in favor of the doctrine that the President's recognition of Kellogg is conclusive upon himself, is to be found in the inconveniences which would result from his being declared a usurper. But it is believed that these inconveniences are more fanciful than real. If Kellogg is a usurper, not as much suffering would result from setting him aside now as would result from permitting him to continue his usurpation, and from his being declared an usurper by a subsequent rightful state government. But it is believed that in either event no substantial injustice could result, if the courts do their duty and decide according to law questions growing out of rights acquired under his government. For while he continues supported by the highest political power of the nation, he is the de facto governor, and his is the de facto government of the state. It follows that rights acquired on the faith of his government (except those acquired by the usurpers themselves, for they can acquire no rights by virtue of their own wrong) are as valid and meritorious as they would have been if acquired under the legitimate government. As the President's action in the premises concludes all persons until it is revised by Congress, so all persons are obliged to give the usurping government the same faith and credit as though it were the government de jure. Its bonds, and other obligations emitted under its authority, or under authority of acts passed by its legislature, are, except when in the hands of the usurpers themselves and those who have colluded with them, of the same validity as though it had been issued under the authority of a government de jure; and any court of justice which would countenance their repudiation, would not be deserving of the name. Assuming that the President's original decision in recognizing Kellogg was erroneous, and that he has become convinced of his error, the mischief of his not undoing it consists in the fact that important rights will be acquired on the faith of it, both in this country and in Europe, which may be overthrown by the intemperance of a subsequent state government.

Since the foregoing was written we have seen a letter of Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, in the New York Herald, for the 17th instant, in which he reaches the same result as Mr. O'Conor, though by a different process of reasoning.

—THE Virginia "oyster law," which we presume prohibits citizens of other states from taking oysters in the waters of Virginia, has been declared unconstitutional by Judge Bond of the federal circuit court.

Accommodation Indorsement by One Partner—Notice.

J. B. S. LEMOINE, ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY OF EARICKSON & BOYD, v. BANK OF NORTH AMERICA.

United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Missouri, September Term, 1874.

Before Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Accommodation Indorsement—Notice.—If the maker of an indorsed note carries it to a bank for discount on his own account, this is notice to the bank that the indorsement thereon is an accommodation indorsement. Such is the presumption of law, if there is nothing in the transaction to repel it.

2. ——. ——. Indorsement by Firm.—If such indorsement be that of a firm, the bank discounting the note, under such circumstances, must, at its peril, ascertain whether there was any special authority, express or implied, for one partner to sign the partnership name as an accommodation indorser.

This is a contest between the Bank of North America and th assignee of Earickson and Boyd, bankrupts, respecting the liability of the firm on the indorsement of the name of the firm upon two promissory notes. A copy of one of the notes is as follows:

"ST. LOUIS, June 11, 1873.

"Sixty days after date we promise to pay to the order of Earickson and Boyd thirty-five hundred dollars, etc., at the Bank of North America, St. Louis, Mo.

"[Signed.] WHITE BROS.

"Indorsed: EARICKSON & BOYD."

The other note is for $2,500, dated June 17, 1873, at sixty days, with the same names as makers as the one above copied.

From the evidence before it, the district court found that the bank was entitled to have the amount of the two notes ($6,000 in all), allowed against the firm assets. The assignee appealed the case, and new pleadings were filed in the United States Circuit Court, as in action at law by the bank upon the indorsement. The facts in the case were found by the district court to be, that John K. Earickson and J. Will. Boyd formed a partnership on the 1st of January, 1873. By articles of copartnership both partners were prohibited from signing the firm name for the security or accommodation of third parties, and it was further stipulated that Earickson should have exclusive charge of the tobacco factory of the firm, and Boyd of the office and finances. The firm did not need any accommodation or borrow any money, except on drafts against their sales of tobacco, which they sometimes discounted at the bank. The Bank of North America had no knowledge of any of the above facts. The firm failed, owing about $60,000, of which amount only about $3,500 was legitimate indebtedness, the residue of the indebtedness having been created by Earickson, without Boyd's knowledge or consent, by using the firm name on commercial paper, for his, Earickson's, private benefit, or by indorsing for White Bros. The latter firm were also indorsers on accommodation paper drawn in the name of Earickson and Boyd, by Earickson, and the firm received no benefit therefrom. On the contrary, this was done without Boyd's knowledge or consent. The only instance to arouse Boyd's suspicions occurred in March, 1873, when he charged Earickson with using the firm name for private purposes. Earickson admitted the fact, but said it was only in one instance, and that he had the means to take up that paper. Boyd threatened to dissolve the firm if the act was repeated. Earickson took up that paper and Boyd knew of no other paper having been given, until after the failure of White Bros. Of these facts the bank had no knowledge. The notes upon which this claim is founded were made by White Bros., payable to the order of Earickson and Boyd, and indorsed with the firm names of Earickson and Boyd, but without the knowledge of Boyd. White handed the note to a director of the bank in the street; the director laid the note before the board of directors and it was discounted. The other note was handled in the same manner through a different director. The proceeds were placed to the credit of Earickson and Boyd, and the money was drawn on their checks, signed in the handwriting of Earickson, which checks were drawn to the order of White Bros. and indorsed by them. The notes were protested, and Boyd was ignorant of all these transactions. It does not appear that the bank had any knowledge of the connection or relations of the two firms, except what appeared in the papers in question. The case was submitted to the court on the statement of facts substantially as above.

J. G. Chandler, for the assignee; John R. Shepley, for the bank.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—On the facts found by the district court, upon which, by stipulation, the cause is submitted to this court, it is to be taken as true that the notes in the question were indorsed with the firm name of Earickson and Boyd, solely for the accommodation of White Bros., the makers, without any consideration to the endorsers therefor. It is to be taken as true that this indorsement of the firm name was made by Earickson without the consent of Boyd, and against the express stipulation on this subject in their articles of copartnership, and that the notes, when thus indorsed, were returned to the possession of the makers, from whom the bank received them, and at whose instance it discounted them, and who, through the checks of Earickson drawn in the firm name, received the proceeds of the transaction.

There is no finding or agreement that the indorsement of the firm name was made in accordance with any habit of dealing of the firm known to Boyd, or that there was, with Boyd's knowledge, such a course of dealing as respects accommodation indorsements in the firm name, as to justify an inference of Earickson's authority to bind the firm in this manner.

I concede, that in favor of third persons acting in good faith, it is a presumption of law that notes indorsed in the name of the firm were indorsed on the partnership account, and hence the indorsement on the notes in question will bind the firm unless it appear that the bank had notice that the indorsement was made outside the partnership affairs. Story on Notes, sec. 72; Byles on Bills, 47; Austin v. Vandermark, 4 Hill (N. Y.), 259–262: per Nelson, C. J. But inasmuch as the settled rule of law is, that it is not within the general scope of one partner to bind the firm by contract of suretyship, or to issue accommodation paper in the name of the firm for third persons, if the bank had notice that this was an accommodation indorsement, the burden of proof is upon it to show the assent of the other partners (either expressly, or from the firm's course of dealing in this respect), or their subsequent ratification. Byles on Bills, 47, and cases cited in the notes.

If, therefore, the bank discounted these notes without notice of the fact that the name of the firm had been indorsed upon them by one of the partners without the consent of the other, and for the accommodation of the makers, it is entitled to hold the firm upon the indorsement, although, in point of fact, it was placed there by one of the partners in fraud of the rights of his copartner, or without authority from him.

And the question on which the case turns is, whether the bank had such notice, for it is not attempted to show that Earickson had authority from Boyd, express or implied, to make the indorsement.

The bank is sought to be affected with such notice, by virtue of the fact that, after the notes bore the indorsement of the firm, they were in the hands of the makers, who met one of the directors of the bank when on his way to a meeting of the board of directors, and giving him the notes, asked him to have them discounted for the makers. It does not appear that the director informed the board of whom he had received the notes; but this is not material, for the learned counsel for the bank conceded in the argument that he supposed the law to be that the board or the bank would be chargeable with the knowledge of the director thus obtained.

Thus viewed, the real question in the case is reduced to this: Does the fact that the maker is in possession of a note before maturity, indorsed by another, affect the bank that receives it from the maker and discounts for him, with notice that it was indorsed for the maker's accommodation?

At the bar, counsel stated that they had been unable to find any adjudged cases upon the exact point, and they argued it on general principles. In view of the nature of the notice required to defeat the rights of the holder for value of commercial paper, as settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in Goodman v. Simmonds (20 How. 343), I was at first impressed in favor of the bank; but subsequent reflection has brought me to an opposite conclusion. To make accommodation paper is so entirely extra the business of a copartnership and the legitimate authority of a partner, that the presumption is properly against the power of one partner thus to bind his copartner. Therefore, when a bank has knowledge that an indorsement of the name of a firm is an accommodation indorsement, it is bound, at its peril, to ascertain whether the members of the firm, on whom it intends to rely, assented to the use of their name. This it can easily do. While on the other hand, if the bank were entitled to presume that the other members of the firm assented, the presumption would, in many instances, as in the case before us, be contrary to the fact and highly disastrous to innocent partners, who would be without the means of guarding against the fraudulent use of the copartnership name in unauthorized transactions.

If the facts of the case, as found by the district court, be considered, there can be little doubt that the bank knew the discount was for the benefit of White Bros., and consequently that the endorsement of Earickson and Boyd was presumptively, as it was in fact, for the accommodation of the makers.

On examination I find several cases distinctly asserting this to be the law, and I have not met with any holding a different view.

When a note not due is taken by the makers to a bank for disunt for their account, with an indorsement thereon, the presumption, unless there is something in the transaction to repel it, is, that the indorsers are sureties for the makers, and that they did indorse it in the ordinary course of business. Upon this subject, Mr. Chancellor Walworth, in Stall v. Catskill Bank, 18 Wend. 478, holds this language: "If, therefore, it appears from the face of the paper that the partnership name is signed as surety for some other person, the party who takes the note from such person has actual notice of the fact that it is not signed in the ordinary course of partnership business. He must, therefore, at his peril make the necessary enquiries and ascertain that there is some special authority for one partner to sign the partnership name as such surety, express or implied. So, if the drawer of a note carries it to the bank to get it discounted on his own account, or transfers it to a third person, with the name of the firm endorsed thereon, the transaction on its face shows that it is a mere accommodation endorsement, or the note would not be in the hands of the endorser, and the bank or person who thus receives it from the drawer, being thus chargeable with notice that the firm are mere sureties of the drawer, and that it has not passed through their hands in the ordinary course of partnership business, the members of the firm, who have been made sureties without their consent, are not liable to such holder of the note."

This language was quoted and approved by Mr. Chief Justice Sawyer in giving the judgment of the Supreme Court of California in Hendrie v. Berkowitz, 37 Cal. 113, 1869, and in which the court distinctly held, in a case precisely like the one now before the court, that the presumption was that the indorsement was an accommodation indorsement, and that the burden of proving the consent of the member who did not write the indorsement, is upon the holder. So, in Overton v. Hardin, 6 Coldw. 375, 1869, the Supreme Court of Tennessee said: "There can be no doubt that the possession of an indorsed note by the maker is presumptive evidence that it was indorsed for his accommodation." Edwards on Bills, 103, 105; Brown v. Taber, 5 Wend. 566; Erwin v. Shaffer, 9, Ohio St. 43.

In this last case, Brinckerhoff, J., says: "That although an indorsed note in the hands of the maker, after due, is presumed to have performed its office, and to have been paid off and taken up by the maker, yet no such presumption arises in the case of such a note before due; but that, on the contrary, in such case it is a matter of legal presumption that the note is unsatisfied, and is indorsed and placed in the hands of the maker for his accommodation. Wallace v. The Branch Bank, 1 Ala., 565; Mauldin v. Branch Bank, 2 Ala., 502; Stall v. Catskill Bank, 18 Wend. 478." See also language of Mr. Justice Nelson, in Bank of Rochester v. Bowen, 7 Wend, 159; Byles on Bills, 47 and note.

The amount of the notes, less the discount, was, in accordance with a usage of the bank, placed to the credit of the last indorsers —in this case Earickson & Boyd—and was drawn out on the two checks of Earickson & Boyd, signed by Earickson without the knowledge of Boyd, in favor of White Brothers. One of these checks showed on its face that it was for the proceeds of the note discounted, and amount of both showed that it was for the note transactions. It is insisted that this makes the indorsement binding on both. This view rests upon the ground of ratification by Boyd; but the essential elément of knowledge on his part, both of the fact of the indorsement and of the check being drawn, is wanting. The checks do not, therefore, change the rights of Boyd, or make binding upon him his partner's act in indorsing the firm's name to the note in question. The district court erred in holding that the two notes were a claim upon the firm assets. The indorsement is alone binding upon Earickson.

JUDGMENT ACCORDINGLY.

Bankruptcy—Composition with Creditors.

I. In re HASKELL.

United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts.

Hon. JOHN LOWELL, District Judge.

1. Bankruptcy—Composition.—Under the amended bankrupt act, the mere fact that the bankrupt, if opposed, would be unable to obtain his discharge in bankruptcy, will not necessarily prevent the court from allowing a resolution of composition.

The creditors need not be informed beforehand of the exact proposition to be submitted by the bankrupt at a meeting called to consider a composition.

The schedules filed in the bankruptcy case are ordinarily a sufficient statement of the bankrupt's assets and liabilities.

LOWELL, J.—Several objections are taken to the acceptance of the resolutions of creditors to accept a composition of twenty-five cents on the dollar.

Section seventeenth of the amended bankrupt act introduces a new feature into the system, by enabling a certain amount and proportion of the creditors to accept a composition which shall be binding on all the rest. Full power is given to the supreme court to make rules, but until the next session of that court, the law, being in full operation, must be worked out as well as may be. Three points have been argued:

1. That there should be a written proposition from the bankrupt, preceding the notice to creditors, to lay the foundation for their action, and to inform them what they were to be asked to accept.

There is much force in this objection, abstractly considered, and it may be that the rules will prescribe something on the subject, but the statute does not, I think, require it. The course of proceeding pointed out by the law seems to be for the creditors to meet and discuss, the debtor being present and answering all questions, and then they may not only accept or reject a proposition which was made and filed ten days before, but the debtor may make and they may accept quite a different proposition from that which he came prepared to offer.

The creditors are to be notified of the time, place and purpose of the meeting, but not necessarily of the precise proposition to be made; unless the matter should be carefully regulated, there might be danger of introducing too much precision, by requiring that there should be a written point of departure for these proceedings. We have taken this section from the English act of 1869, 32 and 33 Vic. chapter 71, section 126. Under that act, very many and careful rules have been made and forms have been prescribed. Nos. 106 to 108.

These forms do not contain, either in the application by the debtor or in the notice to his creditors, any intimation of what the proposition is likely to be. This shows that the judges construe that section in the way I have suggested: there seems to be no reason to say that the debtor must have made up his own mind what he will offer before he meets his creditors. He may be investigating his affairs and may need their advice and assistance.

2. A somewhat similar course of reasoning applies to the second objection, which is, that the statement of assets produced at the meeting was insufficient. This was the schedule of assets already filed in bankruptcy. There is nothing in the mere words of the statute to require any other or different statement than is required in bankruptcy, and the most obvious course would be to make it as much like that schedule as might be, which is the rule prescribed by the court in England.

It is true that such a schedule cannot inform creditors of such particulars as will enable them to decide understandingly upon an offer of composition. But what written statement will do this? The law requires the debtor to be present and to answer all enquiries, and the creditors are not bound to act until all such enquiries have been answered, including those by a majority or by a single creditor, and including a due inspection and explanation of the books.

All this had been done some weeks before by a committee of creditors who had reported to the others; so that there was no real lack of information in this case, and I do not think I could lay down any better general rule for the written statement, than that in cases in which the sworn schedules have already been filed, they shall be used.

To consider the third objection in all its possible bearings, would be tedious. The objecting creditor offered evidence which he insists proves that a preference to a considerable amount was made to one creditor in June, after the debtor was insolvent.

It is said that this fact would prevent the debtor's discharge, and therefore ought to prevent the acceptance of the resolution which, if recorded, is intended to work a discharge.

As I said at the hearing, I do not believe the statute intends that no debtor can compound with his creditors under this section, who would not be able to obtain his discharge.

The law seems to leave it very much to the requisite number and amount of creditors, who, if all the facts are before them, may decide the whole matter. This thing had been known for weeks to all the creditors, and had been the subject of a report by a committee. The court has a discretion to accept or reject, as may be for "the best interests of all concerned." This means the best interests at the time being, all things considered.

In passing upon the acceptance of the resolution, I think the court ought to take into view all the circumstances, including, perhaps, the probability of a discharge in bankruptcy, and certainly the conduct of the several parties in its bearing on the composition. I have found nothing in this case which requires me to reject this resolution.

RESOLUTION TO BE RECORDED.

II. In re WALD & AEHLE.

United States District Court, Western District of Missouri.

Hon. ARNOLD KREKEL, District Judge.

1. Bankruptcy—Composition—Number of Creditors.—In estimating the number of creditors who are to be counted in passing a resolution in favor of a composition with the bankrupt, and also the number of names which are to be attached to the confirmatory statement, creditors whose debts are less than fifty dollars are to be excluded.

Digitized by Google

KREKEL, J.—Under the 43d section of the amended bankrupt act of June 22d, 1874, providing for composition with creditors, the court made an order directing a meeting of creditors to be held to act upon a composition proposed by the bankrupts.

The meeting was held, and the resolution passed, as well as the confirmatory signatures of creditors, are now before the court for its action. From the number of creditors who were present and represented at the meeting which passed the resolution, as well as the number signing the confirmatory statement, it becomes necessary to determine what is meant by language employed in the following part of the section referred to:

"And such resolution shall, to be operative, have been passed by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors of the debtor assembled at such meeting, either in person or in proxy, and shall be confirmed by the signature thereto of the debtor and two-thirds in number and one-half in value of all the creditors of the debtor.

"And in calculating a majority for the purpose of a composition under this section, creditors whose debts amount to sums not exceeding fifty dollars, shall be reckoned in the majority in value, but not in the majority in number." The question is, what creditors shall be counted in order to ascertain the majority spoken of, and are creditors, whose claims do not exceed fifty dollars to be disregarded in computing the majority who must pass the resolution, as well as in ascertaining the number of those who are required to sign the confirmatory statement. The court holds that all creditors whose claims do not exceed fifty dollars must be disregarded in arriving at the majorities required in both cases, that is to say, in passing the resolution there must be a majority of the creditors assembled at such meeting, either in person or by proxy, excluding all whose claims do not exceed fifty dollars, to make the resolution operative, and in the confirmatory statement the number of signers required, must be two-thirds, after excluding from the whole number of creditors all whose claims do not exceed fifty dollars. It may be admitted that this construction will, in some cases, cause hardships, as it increases the trouble or difficulty on the part of bankrupts to obtain the requisite number. It must be remembered, however, that the whole of the requirements of the bankrupt act in some sense may be called a forced proceeding, so far as the creditor is concerned; for the failing circumstances of the debtor largely interfered with his freedom of action.

A creditor may, under compulsion, as it were, attend the meeting of creditors provided for, but suppose he does not on account of the expense he must incur, which, though small, may be large when compared with the amount offered in composition, or he fails from any other cause to attend, the law should not, on that account, be construed against him, and favorable to the debtor who makes the offer. Throughout the whole section from which the quotation is made, greater regard is had to amounts than number. To illustrate; in providing for the taking of bankrupt estate out of the hands of the courts, and placing them in the hands of trustees selected by the creditors, amounts are exclusively regarded by providing that three-fourths in value of the creditors whose claims shall have been proven, shall pass the resolution.

The bankrupts will be required to bring themselves within the views of the court here expressed, in order to have their cases passed upon favorably.

A Point in the Law of Homesteads—Partition.

OFFICE OF THE STATE REPORTER,
ANDOVER, N. H., October 9, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I learn that one of your corps is preparing a monograph upon that marvel of intricacy, the law of homesteads. I herewith enclose you the head-notes in Barney v. Leeds, one of the latest contributions on that subject. It is the same case reported in 51 N. H. 281. It was decided at the August term, 1874, Foster, J., delivering the opinion. These head-notes were prepared by him, at my request. The statute refered to in the last head-note, is as follows:

"When any estate is so situated that it cannot be divided so as to give to each owner his equal share therein without great prejudice or inconvenience, the same or part thereof may be assigned to one of the owners, he paying to the other persons interested, who shall have less than their shares, such sums of money as the committee shall award, or giving bond, with sufficient sureties, to pay the same, with interest, within such time as the court shall order."

The significance of the opinion arises from the fact, that the court is understood to have denied, in substance, though not in form, the power of the legislature to authorize a court of law to compel one person to buy another's land, for which he never contracted, which he does not want, and for which he has not the money to pay.

Apropos of your article on "Juries," our last legislature practically abolished trial by jury, in civil causes, by making it the duty of the court to send them all to referees, unless satisfied by some party that such a course would be inexpedient. I will endeavor to send you in a future note, the result of this experiment so far as developed. Very truly yours.

JOHN M. SHIRLEY.

BARNEY V. LEEDS.

The appraisal of a committee, setting off a dedtor's homestead, upon the levy of an execution, is conclusive upon the question of its value, until invalidated by some proceeding brought for the purpose of vacating or revising the record thereof. It cannot be called in question upon a subsequent proceeding for partition between the debtor and his creditor, to whom the residue of the estate has been assigned.

Whenever the estate of tenants in common is practically incapable of division, by assigning to each owner thereof, his equal portion in severalty, he cannot be compelled, under the provisions of § 25, Ch. 228, Gen. Stats., either to sell his own share, or purchase that of his co-tenant; but in such a case resort may be had to a court of equity, which has power to compel a sale of the entire estate, and a distribution of its proceeds upon equitable principles.

Jury Service in the South—A New Plan for Getting Good Juries.

OXFORD, MISS., October 13, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I have read with interest an article on the jury system, in a recent number of your journal (ante, p. 487). It is manifest to all who have considered the subject, that some reformation on this subject is necessary in most of the states, and especially in this state, where, under a law of the state, which has been in force for many years, the petit juries are drawn from a box containing the names of all males who are householders, between the ages of twenty-one and sixty, irrespective of their intellectual or moral qualifications. The system was bad enough before the addition of the newly enfranchised class, but few of whom, comparatively, have had such opportunities as are necessary to qualify a man for this important service.

The act of Congress requires that jurors in the United States courts, shall have the same qualifications, and be selected in the same mode required by the laws of the state in which the court is held, for juries in the courts of the state, as far as practicable, leaving it to the court or judge to determine the practicability of the state law. If the names in the jury boxes were such as desired, the United States authorities would have no right to go into them; to avoid this, the practice was for many years to make an order directing the marshal to summon from certain designated counties the required number, who were qualified jurors under the laws of the state. To those selected by the marshals themselves, no just objection could be made; but as the law allows as good as no compensation for the service, it was natural (and I do not know that they could much be blamed for it) for the marshal to adopt the most inexpensive mode of getting jurors, which has generally been by sending a special deputation to the sheriffs of the counties, assuming that the sheriffs knew the proper persons to summon. But the sheriffs, who are generally looking to a re-election, desire to please all parties, and, feeling no special interest in the court, excuse intelligent business men when requested, and often select those who request it, and who have no other business, and who are poorly qualified for this service. Besides this evil, it subjects the marshal to the reproach of partiality in his selections, to favor particular interests.

This system did not conform either to the form or spirit of the state law. To avoid these objections and to conform to the spirit of the state law in selecting the juries by ballot, and at the same time to procure such as were in every way qualified, I have in the courts in which I am the sole judge, and Judge Woods, the circuit judge, and myself, have in the circuit court, adopted the following rules: The commissioners of the court in their respective localities select some three hundred names of gentlemen of well known intelligence, integrity, impartiality and fair mindedness, irrespective of race, or party affiliations. These names are forwarded to the clerk without any knowledge being given as to who they are, and are placed on slips of paper or ballots and placed in a box, which is kept locked except when the drawing is had, which is done by the marshal and clerk in the presence of the judge or a commissioner specially appointed to superintend it. The names drawn constitute the venire, and are summoned by the marshal or his deputy; both grand and petit juries are drawn in the same way.

The experiment has proved a success. The jurors obtained under it would do credit to any court. It relieves the marshal from any blame, avoids any possibility of a packed jury for any party; since in the first place the names in this jury box are unknown to any one but the commissioner and clerk, until drawn, and if they were known, it would not be known whose name would be drawn. The drawing is continued until the names are exhausted, when the box is refilled. The attorney-general has recommended to Congress to adopt a similar rule for all the United States courts, which I am satisfied is the best rule that can be adopted. Some of the states, I learn, have something like the same plan. Some plan should be adopted by which to secure the very best men for this important service.

I submit our rule for your consideration, and for any use you may see proper to make of it. Yours, etc., R. A. HILL.

Notes and Queries.

I. JUDGMENTS OF JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL., Oct. 13, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A. instituted a suit before a justice of the peace, against B. A trial was had, the jury returning a verdict in the following form:

"We, the jury, fine for the plaintiff fifteen dollars and costs."

No further proceedings were had before the magistrate, and the magistrate failed to render a judgment on the verdict. From this verdict the defendant appealed the cause to the circuit court.

Would a motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the justice rendered no judgment from which the defendant was authorized by law to appeal, be sustained? Would like a reply, with authorities, through the columns of the JOURNAL. C. D. M.

ANSWER.—We find that the precise case to which the above query has reference, has recently been adjudicated by Tipton, J., of the Circuit Court of McLean County, Illinois, in Merrit v. Tarman, 1 Monthly Western Jurist, 264, the learned judge declining to dismiss the appeal. In support of his position he cites the following cases: Lynch v. Kelly, 41 Cal. 232; Tilton v. Mulliner, 2 Johns. 181; Gaines v. Betts, 2 Douglass (Mich.) 99; Iverall v. Pero, 7 Mich. 316. With this view, we entirely agree. As was said by the court in Gaines v. Betts, supra, "the verdict is itself the judgment of the law in the case, and the justice is simply required to make the entry on his docket. If he neglects to do so, still the verdict must be considered the final determination of the cause." We agree with the reasoning of Judge Tipton: "The failure of the justice of the peace to formally enter the judgment on the verdict, amounted simply to an irregularity that might be waived; and the defendant having regarded the same as a valid judgment and appealed from the same, thereby waived any right to complain on his part." The question may, however, be controlled in eaeh state by local statutes.

II. STATUTE OF FRAUDS—ANOTHER ANSWER TO W. F. (ANTE, P. 482).

We thank S. W. W. for the following, and are sorry that want of space has compelled us to delay it so long:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., Sept. 30, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A correspondent presents to you the following question, which you request your readers to answer, to wit: "A is renting a store by the month from C., at $40 per month. B. offers him $200 to move out and give him possession; A. accepts the offer with the proviso that he be allowed to remain until he can get another house; in two week's time he moves out and tenders the key to B., which B. refuses to accept. The contract was not in writing. Was it within the statute of frauds? Is it an interest in land?" Will you allow me to dash off a few thoughts on the subject.

First, presuming that it is very doubtful about its being an interest in real estate, but whether it be or not, if there was no part payment, delivery or earnest given to bind the bargain, the case falls within another section of the statute of frauds, as the contract price exceeds the sum which requires payment, delivery or earnest in sales of personal property. And lastly, if the cosideration for the promise was neither real nor personal, then it was nothing, and the contract was nude pact.

But to the law as applied to this case. The case is a little obscurely put, but if I understand it rightly, it presents a case either of a fixed term, one month, or a common law tenancy at will.

It is in either event an interest in real estate, as now construed by the courts. Let us see what the law applicable to it is, viewed as a fixed term.

Uunder the statute of frauds, 29 Chas. II. C. 3, Sec. 4, which has been adopted in most of the states, a written agreement signed by the parties or his agent is generally necessary to the validity of any contract for the sale or purchase of lands, tenements or hereditaments, or any estate or interest in or concerning them, whether such estate or interest be subsisting or be proposed to be created de novo. Dart on Vendor and Purchaser, Chap. 2, p. 91; Sug. 135; Atty-Gen. v. Day, 1 Vesey, Sr. 218, and 12 Vesey Jun. 472; ex parte Cutts, 3 Deacon, 267, by Lord Cottenham.

Although an actual demise by parol for any term not exceeding three years at a rent not less than two-thirds of the improved value, was valid under the second section of the statute of 29 Chas. II, an executory agreement for such a demise is void unless in writing; so, a parol agreement by a lessee, for an assignment of the residue of his term, being less than three years, is void, and cannot, it would seem, operate as an underlease. Sug. 95; Barret v. Rolph, 14 Mees. and W. 348; Dart on Vendors, p. 92. New York and most of the American states have adopted the English statute with some modifications. For instance, there it is applied not only to every estate and interest in lands, but to every trust or power concerning the same, and the exception in favor of leases is confined to leases for a term not exceeding one year. (Such is the limit in Arkansas). See Trear v. Hardenburgh, 5 Johns. Rep. 272; 7 Cowan Rep. 263.

By the English statute, a lease for three years might be made by parol, provided the rent reserved did not exceed two-thirds of the improved value of the property.

In most of the states the period for which a parol lease may be made is limited to one year. In the case stated by your question, it is either a bargain for the transfer of an unexpired term, with possible right of renewal, or it was the transfer of a tenancy at will, which the courts construed by judicial legislation to be from year to year—as to which more anon—or else it was nothing and the contract was void for want of consideration. If it involved the transfer of a term, being an interest in real estate, the case is on all fours with the case of Barrett v. Rolph, 14; Meeson v. Welsby, decided in the Exchequer Chamber of England in June 1845. See also the case of Mollett v. Brayne, 2 Campbell 103; Thomas v. Cook, 2 B. & Ald. 119; Graham v. Whichelo, 1 C. & M. 188, and Lyon v. Reed, 13 M. & W. 285. In the case of Barrett v. Rolpb, although the 2d section of the act of 29 Chas. II, made prarol cases for less than three years valid, yet as the 4th section of that act required the contract, which transferred any interest in real estate, to be in writing, and a leasehold being such interest, could not be transferred by parol, although an underlease might be so made, the court refused in that case to recognize this transfer as an underlease. I have been unable to find any English decision changing this ruling. If we follow it, it is inevitable that in all cases, where one party holding an interest in real estate attempts to transfer it, although that interest be one which, by the statute of frauds, may be created by parol, being for less than three years in England, or less than one year in those states where the limits are shortened, he must do so in writing, or the case falls within the statute, and is void.

There has been another question in those states, wherein the statute of 29 Chas. II has not been literally adopted: As to whether or not a tenancy at will, as construed by the courts, is such an interest in real estate as will bring it within that provision of the statute; for the English statute expressly prohibited the parol assignment of a lease in this language: "And that no lease or estate, either of freehold or term of years should be assigned, granted, or surrendered, unless in writing." See 4 Kent Commentaries, pages 95–6; see also, 7 Barb. (S. C.) Rep. 191. We think, however, in these states, which have left out the specific provision of the English statute as to assignment of lease, there can be no doubt but that such assignments come within this general provision regulating sales of real estate or any interest therein. The following American cases bear strongly upon this question: McDowell v. Delap, 2 A. K. Marshall, 33, which involved a lease. Possession is an interest in land within the meaning of the statute. Howard v. Easotn, 7 Johnson, 205; Hesseltine, v. Seavey, 4 Shep. 212.

The sale of timber on land growing, with an agreement that the purchaser shall have a certain time within which to take it off, and right of entry therefor, is a sale of an interest in land. Olmstead v. Niles, 7 New Hamp. 523. Many cases conflict with this. An agreement for future conditional sale is within the statute. Folsom v. Great Falls Co., 9 New Hamp. 355. A right to enter upon the land of another to repair a dam and embankment necessary to the working of a mill originally erected with the consent of the owner of the soil, is an interest in land, within the statute. Cook v. Sterns, 11 Mass. 533. See also, Scott v. McFarland, 13 Mass. 309; Stone v. Crocker, 19 Pickering, 292. A parol contract, to make a lease, is void, even where the consideration of the deed which conveyed the land was such parol promise made by the grantee, with the further promise to support the grantor for life. Townsend v. Townsend, 6 Met. (Mass.) 319. An agreement, concerning leasing real estate not to be performed within a year, is not within the statute of frauds. Janes v. Finney, 1 Root, 549. An agreement to surrender a lease is within the statute. Lammot v. Gist, 2 Har. & Gill, 433. Also see, on the subject of assignment of leases and prescription rights, etc., Schmitz v. Lauferty, 29 Ind. 400; Lester v. White's heirs, 44 Ill. 464; Hogsett v. Ellis, 17 Mich. 351; Greton v. Smith, 33 N. Y. 245. This citation of American authorities, which has been taken mostly from the United States Digests, gives a fair specimen of the drift of American decisions.

At the page above cited from 4 Kent. Comm. will be found a note which contains a list of all the states which have adopted the English statute, with those which, like New York, have modified it, and the nature and extent of the change in each; by the use of this note and examination of the authorities of the several states, it will be found that there is no diversity of opinion as to the fact that a leasehold interest or possessory right, is an interest in real estate, within the meaning of the statute, as adopted by all of them, and being such interest the assignment of it is not a lease for less than one year under New York's modification, or less than three under 29 Chas. II, but is the transfer of an interest in real estate within the meaning of the 4th section.

Let us now examine the case, viewing it as a common law tenancy at will.

Originally an estate at will was not bounded by limits with respect to time. 2 Bl. Com. Ch. 9, page 145, to the end; Littleton, p. 1 Ch. 8, and comments; Preston Estates, Ch. Will; Com. Dig. Estate, 258; 1 Inst. 57; Watkins on Conv. 1–9.

As such estates depended upon the will of both parties, the dissent of either determined the estate, and the conveyance by the tenant determined the will, and ended the estate. But latter judges beginning with Mansfield, who was a great innovator, have given something of a term to this class of tenants, and this kind of tenancy has, under the effect of judicial legislation become nearly extinct practically. In the case of Timmons v. Rowlinson, 3 I, Burrow, page, 1603, Lord Mansfield, said, "and as it is notorious that an infinite quantity of land is holden in this kingdom without lease, therefore, it is an extensive case and proper to be remedied. In the 4th George II, the provision was for those cases where the landlord gave the tenant notice to quit. This the 11th of George II, provides for the case of the tenant giving his landlord notice of his intention to quit, and not delivering up possession according to it."

These tenancies, so numerous in England, in Lord Mansfield's day were all in a technical sense estates at will. But says Chancellor Kent, "such estates are said to exist only notionally, and when no certain term is agreed on, they are construed to be tenancies from year to year, and each party is bound to give reasonable notice of an intention to terminate the estate." 4 Kent Com. 111, 112 (Margin). Although judicial decisions have construed technical tenancies at will as being from year to year, yet there are cases like Doe v. Wood, 14 Messon & Welsby, 682, wherein it is held that a simple permission to occupy creates a tenancy at will, unless there are circumstances to show an intention to create a tenancy from year to year; but that is not the case now before me, as I understand it, although we are left in the dark, as to A's exact relations with his landlord.

Though the tenant of a house is equally under the protection of notice as the tenant of a farm, which requires six months, or at least reasonable notice of the determination of the will, yet if lodgings be hired by the month, the time of notice must be proportionately reduced. 4 Kent Com. 114. While it is true that an actual tenant at will, if there be any such, has no assignable interest, though it is sufficient to admit of enlargment by release, yet these estates above indicated are constructive tenancies, from year to year, and may be assigned. 4 Kent, 114.

I therefore answer the question, that the case put to your correspondent is within the statute. On the other hand, if the possessory right, or tenancy at will, or whatever else it is, be not an interest in real estate, then it is nothing, and the contract is void for want of consideration; for it is certainly will not be contended that it is personal property. But if the thing sold be personal, no earnest to bind the bargain being given, and being over the value of thirty dollars, is it not still in the statute of frauds? S. W. W.

III. EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPTS—LEADING QUESTIONS.

SAVANNAH, GA., September 24, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—An asignee brings suit to recover a certain sum of money for the bankrupt's estate, which suit involves a fraudulent settlement between the bankrupt and the defendant. The bankrupt's testimony being necessary on trial, and he having removed from the district in which the bankruptcy was committed, the assignee sues out interrogatories. Can the assignee put leading questions in such a case, treating the bankrupt not as an ordinary witness, but as one who is bound by the bankrupt act (section 26) to give any and all information which will enable the assignee to receive, demand and recover debts or property due to his trust estate? Or, does such a mode of eliciting testimony for the assignee in this case refer more to the rules of the common law or to examinations of a bankrupt before a register, under section 26 of the bankrupt law?

If the common law rule as to leading questions in interrogatories should be sustained in such a case, then could not the assignee still put such questions, on the ground that the bankrupt is to be considered an unwilling witness, having been a party to the fraud? GUION.

ANSWER.—In an action of this kind the general rules of evidence would apply, and leading questions would not be proper, unless in the discretion of the court. If it appeared that the bankrupt was a hostile witness, or if the fraud was a fraud in fact, leading questions would be allowed.

IV. HOMESTEAD EXEMPTIONS.

CORVALLIS, OREGON, Sept. 21, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—By the act of Congress, commonly known as the "Homestead Law," approved May 20, 1862, 12 Stat. 392, it is provided: "No lands acquired under the provisions of this act, shall, in an any event, become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of a patent therefor." Before the expiration of the five years from date of settlement, the party pays the minimum price as allowed by section 8 of said act, and acquires a right to the title.

1. Are said lands liable to be taken in satisfaction of debts contracted prior to the issuing of patent therefor?

2. Are lands thus obtained "acquired under the provisions of this act," within the meaning of the clause above quoted? Truly, S.

ANSWER.—In view of the settled rule of liberal construction of such exemptions for the benefit of the family, it is probable the court would answer the first question in the negative and the second in the affirmative. We know of no decision on the question.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Legal Intelligencer, for October 9, contains a long, and we should judge, important opinion of Mr. Justice Strong, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania, in the Locomotive Engine Safety Truck Co. v. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co., ruling the following points:

1. The patent of the Locomotive Engine Safety Truck Company is not invalid for want of novelty in the invention, for. when in combination with a locomotive engine, it is substantially a different truck from any other in use. This combination is a patentable invention.

2. The mere forbearance to apply for a patent during the progress of experiments, and until the party had perfected his invention and tested its value by actual practice, affords no just ground for presuming an abandonment.

Also several interesting decisions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, from which we take the following points:

Ernst v. Wagoner. Defective acknowledgment of a married woman's deed does not entitle her husband's creditor to recover the property from her purchaser.

Pusey, executor, v. Dusenberry. A special partner cannot be made liable as a general partner on account of some acts done after the dissolution of the partnership.

Miller & Reist v. Kreiter. The right of set-off dates from the time that defendant had notice. One defendant may set-off his individual claim against a joint claim against him and another.

Rodgers v. the Riddlesburg Coal and Iron Company. 1. The admission of copies of field notes of a person who was not even the deputy-surveyor, cannot be admitted. 2. An ancient paper is not only one of great age, but it must come from the proper authority to be admitted,

The Legal Gazette, for October 9, reports with full statement and argument of counsel the case of the Wenona, Supreme Court of the United States, opinion by Mr. Justice Clifford. In this case the steamer Wenona was condemned for a collision with a sailing vessel, the wheelsman, mate, captain and other witnesses on the sailing vessel swearing positively to courses, and distances and times immediately prior to the collision, and these showing that the steamer was in fault; while though there was strong evidence on the steamer's side to show that these courses, distances, and times could not have been truly stated by the witnesses in behalf of the sailing vessel, this evidence was inferential chiefly, consisting of conclusions or arguments drawn from other facts sworn to, as ex gr., the lights which the steamer saw and the lights which she did not see on the sailing vessel, and the effect of giving credence to this infe ential or argumentative testimony being to convict, as of necessity, the witnesses for the sailing vessel of perjury.

Also Stevenson v, Williams, same court, opinion by Mr, Justice Field, with the following syllabus:

1. The act of Congress of March 2, 1867, under which a removal may be had of causes from a State to a Federal court, only authorizes a removal where an application is made before final judgment in the court of original jurisdiction, where the suit is brought, It does not authorize a removal after an appeal has been taken from such judgment of the court of original jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of the state

2. Where the judgment of a state court was annulled by the decree of a court of the same state, on the ground that the notes on which the judgment was rendered were given for a loan of confederate money, and that the transactions which resulted in the acquisition of the notes were had between enemies during the late civil war, in violation of the proclamation of the President forbidding commercial intercourse with the enemy, this court cannot review the ruling in these particulars. It conflicts with no part of the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, and presents no federal question.

It also publishes Locomotive Engine Safety Truck Co. v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., supra; and also gives condensed notes of several other cases, which have been elsewhere published.

The Pacific Law Reporter, for October 6, publishes Swain v. Duane, Supreme Court of California, which was a suit by a creditor of the husband to subject property claimed by the wife as her separate estate. It also publishes an opinion of Mr. Justice Field in the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of California, in Patterson v. Tatum, an important land case. It also publishes several other short opinions delivered in the Supereme Court of California. In one of these, People v. Frese, the court below instructed the jury as follows:

"You will also observe that the difference between murder and manslaughter is, there is no intention whatever either to kill or to do bodily harm. The killing is the unintentional result of a sudden heat of passion, or of an unlawful act committed without due caution or circumspection." "This, said the supreme court, is clearly erroneous. Whether the homicide amounts to murder or to manslaughter merely, does not depend upon the presence or absence of the intent to kill. In either case, there may be a present intention to kill at the moment of the commission of the act. But when the mortal blow is struck in the heat of passion, excited by a quarrel, sudden, and of sufficient violence to amount to adequate provocation, the law, out of forebearance for the weakness of human nature, will disregard the actual intent and will reduce the offence to manslaughter. In such case, although the intent to kill exists, it is not that deliberate and malicious intent which is an essential element in the crime of murder."

The American Law Review, for October, publishes valuable papers on The Law of Literature and Art in England and America; The Trial of William E. Udderzook; The Wisconsin Railroad Acts, and The Law of Adoption. The rest of its contents comprises a Digest of the English Law Reports for May, June and July, 1874; A Selected Digest of State Reports; Book Notices; List of Law Books published in England and America, since July, 1874; Summary of Events.

The Southern Law Review, for October, contains a long paper on Homicide, and the Defence of Insanity, by James Wyatt Oates, Esq., of Abbeville, Alabama; and another on Railroad Laws, or Legislative Control of Railroads, by S. S. Wallace, Esq., of Denver, Colorado. The remaining portion of its contents comprises a Digest of the English Law Reports; a Selected Digest of State Reports; and several Recent Decisions, among which we notice Memphis Dry Dock Co. v. Waggoner, in which the Supreme Court of Tennessee decides that the proceeding by attachment against boats to enforce liens is not a proceeding in rem, nor an admiralty proceeding, and does not conflict with the jurisdiction of the federal courts in admiralty.

It also publishes Atkieson v. Murfree, recently decided by Mr. Chancellor Cooper, of the Nashville Chancery Court. This case will be read with interest by Tennessee practitioners, as it relates to the vexed question of "Opening the Biddings" after chancery sales, where an advance has been offered. It will be remembered that the July number of the Southern Law Review, contained a caustic and searching paper on this question, by E. S. Hammond, Esq., of Memphis, reviewing the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, in Click v. Burris, in which a rule is laid down that the biddings may be opened upon a mere increased bid, and that an advance of ten per cent. on the previous offer is sufficient for this purpose. This decision Chancellor Cooper had not heard of at the time he decided Atkieson v. Murfree. The learned chancellor takes the view that the biddings should be reopened in proper cases, and that it should be done in the present case, an advance of 18 per cent. having been offered. The following is the syllabus:

1. A sale of land, made by the master, is not complete and binding upon the purchaser until confirmation: Owen v. Owen, 5 Hum. 352; Graves v. Keaton, 3 Cold., 8; Wood v. Morgan, 4 Hum. 372; Jones v, Walkup, 5 Sneed, 135; Moore, ex parte, 3 Head, 171; Rogers v. Clark, 1 Sneed, 665; Armstrong v. McClure, 4 Heisk. 80.

2. And it is the duty of the court, while securing the rights of the successful litigants, to see that the property be sold for the best price that can be had: Childress v. Hurt, 2 Swan, 487; Johnson v. Quarles, 4 Cold. 615.

3. It is allowable, therefore, to open the biddings alone upon the offer of a higher price, if the advance be so considerable as to furnish a sufficient inducement, under all the circumstances, to a resale of the property: Coffin v. Corruth, 1 Cold. 194; Newland v. Gaines, 1 Heisk. 723; Aubrey v. Denny, 2 Moll. 508; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1285.

4. The advance which ought to be deemed sufficient to require the biddings to be opened, must be left to depend in some measure on the circumstances of the given case. An advance of sixteen hundred dollars is clearly sufficient.

5. The better practice, upon opening the biddings, is to authorize tha master, upon notice in the usual way, to receive bids for a limited time, commencing with the advance offered, the bidders to be required to make payments, and give notes as of the date of the original sale, and otherwise to comply with the terms and requirements of that sale, and the highest bidder at the end of that time to be the purchaser.

The American Law Record, concludes in its October number, with what we judge to be a very learned paper by A. T. Whatley, B. A., entitled Historical Sketch of the Law of Piracy. It also contains what we should take to be a very thoughtful and valuable paper by Sheldon Amos, A. M., on Materials of the Science of Law. It also publishes the case of Taylor v. Bonte, Superior Court of Cincinnati, General Term—a case which appears to relate chiefly to questions of local practice. It publishes several other interesting decisions, but these we have either published or noticed as they have appeared in other publications.

The Insurance Law Journal, for September, publishes thirteen important decisions on the law of insurance, fire and life. We may find space to notice some of these hereafter.

The Monthly Western Jurist (Bloomington Ill,), for October, has a leader on Selection and Summoning of Grand Jurors. It also prints Nugent v. Supervisors of Putnam County (ante, p. 153), with a valuable note. It publishes Merritt v. Tarman, McLean County (Ill.) Circuit Court (Tipton, J.), holding that a verdict of a jury before a justice of the peace in this form: "We the jury find for the plaintiff, fifteen dollars and costs," constitutes a valid judgment without any further order of the magistrate.

It prints Lovenguth v. City of Bloomington, Supreme Court of Illinois (Craig, J.), with the following syllabus:

1. This was an action brought in the circuit court by Joseph Lovenguth, against the city of Bloomington, to recover damages for an injury received by a minor son, Emil, in passing over a sidewalk in the city.

2. It appears from the record, that Emil Lovenguth at the time of the accident was eighteen years of age, he was working in the shop of the C. & A. R. R. Co., and in passing from the shop to his boarding place, over a defective sidewalk, he stepped upon a loose board, fell and fractured a bone of his ankle. He was well acquainted with the sidewalk, and knew it was in a bad and unsafe condition; had he so desired he could have gone over another sidewalk to his boarding place, which was entirely safe and secure, and the distance no greater.

3. Upon the evidence submitted, it was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the accident occurred from the negligence and the want of proper care on the part of plaintiff's son, or from the neglect of the city to keep in repair the sidewalk in question. The jury found by their verdict that the injury received grew out of the negligence and the want of proper care of the injured party.

4. The instructions given and refused, examined, and held, that a party has no right to knowingly expose himself to danger, and then recover damages for an injury which he might have averted by the use of reasonable precaution.

5. The city having furnished a safe and secure sidewalk over which the plaintiff's son might have passed affirming the case of Centralia v. Krouse.

6. To recover damages after the commencement of the suit, and for future damages, it must appear from the evidence that the injured party has not at the time recovered, and that the injury is permanent, and if not permanent, at what time a cure could reasonably be anticipated.

It also publishes, Schintz v. Ballard, Circuit Court of Outagamie County, Wisconsin, (Ellis, J.), with the following syllabus:

1. By the terms of the will, the appropriations to the institute are to be made only on the condition that $75,000 shall be contributed by the citizens of Appleton, and the same to be actually paid to the said institute, or secured, to the satisfaction of its board of directors, and of the executor, within three years from the time of the testator's death, or from the time the executor may have $50,000 in readiness for the first endowment mentioned in the will. Held, that the proposed endowment is made to depend upon a condition that may never happen, and that until the contingency does occur, that there is no beneficiary legally capable of receiving the $75,000, nor any part thereof, and that without such a beneficiary, the trust is not present and active, two elements indispensably requsite to the validity of the trust.

2. That this will, if it could be construed as a conveyance of the real estate to the executor in trust, or as giving him a power of sale for the purpose of the intended trust, might, in view of the fact that it allows three years or more, within which the conditions may be fulfilled, create a perpetuity.

3. That by the terms of the statute of Wisconsin, the absolute power of alienation shall not be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever, for a longer period than during the continuence of two lives in being at the creation of the estate.

4. That so much of the will as was intended for the benefit of the Appleton Collegiate Institute, or any other similar institute, etc., held null and void. And that the property intended to be conveyed to the institute, must go as the law directs in relation to the decent of the property of intestates.

5. That the personal property that shall remain after the payment of all debts and funeral expenses and expenses of administration, must be distributed as follows. One half to the defendant, Harriet S. Edwards, under the residuary claim of the will, and the other half, which is not legally disposed of by the will, to the heirs at law, one of whom is the said Harriet S. Edwards, under the statute of Wisconsin.

It republishes from a Pennsylvania Law Journal, the case of Northup v. The First National Bank of Scranton (Ward, Recorder), with the following head-notes. We desire to call attention to these, because they aptly illustrate a mode of constructing the head-notes of cases, which many American editors and reporters have fallen into. They have but one fault; they do not tell what the court decides. They do lay down several propositions of law which the court recognizes arguendo, and with these they sometimes mix points stated in the abstract, which the court may have actually decided; but they nowhere give the facts of the case, and the judgment of the court upon those facts. This the English reporters generally do; and this is one of the features in which their reports are greatly superior to ours:

1 A preliminary injunction should be granted only to prevent irreparable mischief.

2. Such mischief is that for which the law affords no adequate remedy; when such remedy exists an injunction should not be granted.

2. Such remedy is one that affords a full, speedy, complete, feasible and compensatory redress.

4. The bill should aver such mischief, or state facts from which it can be inferred. In this respect the bill is amendable.

5. The right to an injunction must be clearly established, not left in doubt.

6. When a preliminary injunction has been erroneously granted, it should be dissolved on motion.

7. United States bonds are commercial paper, pass by delivery, and subject to all its incidents.

8. A bona fide holder for value of commercial paper has an indefeasible title to it, though he receives it from one without title to it, and fraudulently in possession of it.

9. Such holder has a legal and equitable title to such paper, though it had been stolen from the owner and advertised.

10. When one takes commercial paper as a collateral security, for the payment of a debt contracted on the credit of such security, such debt is a valuable consideration.

11. A guardian has the exclusive right to the custody and management of his ward's estate, and a chancellor cannot restrain the guardian from the management of such estate, until proceedings to remove him are begun or contemplated.

12. The extension of time for payment of a debt, and leaving a pledge still in security for the payment, is not a new pledge for the payment of an antecedent debt.

The Monthly Western Jurist also contains a short but valuable article on Negligence in Crossing a Railroad Track; and another on Recognizances to Keep the Peace.

The Washington Law Reporter, for October 13, published a very interesting and well-reported decision of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, on Soap Factory Nuisances in Washington City. The title of the case is Bates v. District of Columbia. The syllabus is as follows:

1. The 26th section of the act of Congress, to provide for a government for the District of Columbia, designates a board of health, whose duty it shall be to declare what shall be deemed nuisances injurious to health, and to provide for the removal thereof; but it does not confer power upon said board of health to declare anything or any condition of things a nuisance, injurious to health, which was not a nuisance by the rules of the common law, or made such by some statute governing the district.

2. Where the defendant and his ancestors had prosecuted continuously the business of manufacturing soap and candles in the same place for a period of more than forty years, it was held it could not be removed unless the facts upon which the question of nuisance depended were tried by due process of law, consisting of indictment and trial by jury; and it was also held that the board of health had no authority to pass ordinances under which the defendant was prosecuted by information in the police court, for the purpose of recovering a fine or penalty, for maintaining the alleged nuisance.

3. Writ of certiorari is the appropriate remedy to review the proceedings of a subordinate tribunal which has proceeded or is proceeding to judgment without jurisdiction. In a case where the police court has no jurisdiction the writ may issue to review such proceedings, although the statute provides for an appeal where there is to be a re-trial of the case.

In the Irish Law Times, for October 3, we find a well-written leader on the British Revised Statutes. In the Irish Law Times Reports for the same date, there are several cases, which, though turning upon British statutes, may interest our readers. In Gogerty v. The Great Southern and Western Railway Co., Irish Common Pleas, the syllabus is as follows:

In an action against carriers for loss of the plaintiff's goods, upon an issue that the loss arose from the felonious acts of the defendants' servants, it is sufficient for the plaintiff, under the Carriers' Act, section 8, to prove facts which render it more probable that the felony was committed by a servant of the defendant's than by any one not in their employ. Vaughan v. London and North Western Railway Company, L. R. 9 Ex. 93, followed.

In Wallace v. The Dublin and Belfast Junction Railway Co., before the same court, it is held that:

Where goods exceeding £10 in value, and of the description specified in the 1st section of the Carriers' Act (1 W. 4, c. 68), are delivered to a common carrier, without declaring their nature and value, and paying an increased rate for carriage, as notified and required, the carrier is exempted by the statute from liability for delay in the carriage, caused by his having temporarily lost the goods. Compare Hearne v. London South Western Railway Co., 10 Ex. 793; Pianciani v. London South Western Railway Co., 18 C. B. 226.

Moore v. Midland Railway Co., same court, was an action for loss of, and injury to goods, booked at "through" rates, for conveyance by land and by sea. The railway company with whom the contract was made, pleaded conditions in the contract exempting them from liability—firstly, where the loss and injury occurred while shipping, during the voyage, or the landing; and secondly, where it occurred through the default of the master and crew of the vessel by which the goods had been conveyed during a part of the transit. Upon demurrer to the pleas,—held, that the conditions were null and void under the 7th section of the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 31, as limiting the liability of the defendants, for the default of them or their servants, no facts appearing on the pleadings to show that the conditions were "just and reasonable, within the concluding proviso of the section."

In McMullen v. Greene, same court, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, that the plaintiff should enter the defendant's service, as "salesman," in the tea-trade, the plaintiff understanding that he was only to be employed as traveler. The plaintiff afterwards acted for some time in the capacity of traveler; but was ultimately required by the defendant to act in the wholesale warehouse of the defendant. In an action for breach of contract thereupon,—held, that evidence to explain the meaning of the word "salesman," in the written agreement, was admissible. Compare Shore v. Wilson, 9 Cl. & F. 567 (per Tindal, C. J.); Evans v. Pratt, 3 M. & G. 759; Clayton v. Gregson, 6 A. & E. 302; Smith v. Wilson, 3 B. & Ad, 728; Price v. Mouat, 11 C. B. N. S. 508.

The Irish Law Times also reprints, from the London Saturday Review, an article on Irish Juries, which convinces the reader upon indisputable evidence, that trial by jury is a mere farce in that kingdom. Wonder if it is any more a farce than it is in some of the United States? It also reprints from the English Law Times, a very interesting article on the Future of the Legal Profession.

President Lerdo ought to retire now, while his laurels are fresh and green. MR. Those who delight in the study of coustitutional law, and who take pleasure in the reading of solid and forcible legal argument, will not regret reading this. We have the pleasure to acknowledge receiving it, also, in pamphlet form. Mr. May was formerly Lieutenant Governor of Michigan, and is one of the ablest lawyers of that state.

The manner, features, and general appearance of Mr. O'Conor and Mr. Johnson are admirably preserved, and the whole cartoon is an admirable specimen of the art of this unique and successful journal." There is no splitting hairs about it. They differ on a point which is vital, and of such magnitude that none but the ignorant and vulgar can fail to understand it.

—THE resignation of Richard W. Busteed, United States District Judge for Alabama, recently tendered, has been accepted by the President. Among the bar of Alabama, so far as we know, he had the reputation of being a man thoroughly unscrupulous, but of great ability and unquestioned nerve, and withal so adroit in covering his tracks, that the difficulty in procuring sufficient evidence to make his impeachment probable, was very great. Although political feelings no doubt entered into this estimate somewhat, yet it will be remembered that the judiciary committee of the last house, by a vote of six to ten, voted to impeach both him and Judge Durell, and there is little doubt that had he remained on the bench, he would have been impeached at the coming session of Congress. Be this as it may, a man of his ability and address can make much more money in the practice of his profession, than he could honestly make as a federal district judge, especially since the last modification of the bankrupt law.

—POLICE COURT REPORTING.—It does not require a great knowledge of law to be a reporter—that is, a reporter of the decisions of a police court, but it requires a great deal of other knowledge to keep pace with the progress which has been made in that noble art within the last few years. Thus far the police court reporter of the Detroit Free Press, has distanced all his competitors. The following is his report of a recent maritime case:

"The officer said he found Frank Duffy, a lake sailor, rounded to in an alley. He ranged up under his lee rail, forged ahead, and boarded the prisoner at the bow, receiving a couple of kicks in the stomach as he was getting out a line to take the prisoner in tow. The prisoner said it wouldn't take him long to repair damages, and if let off he'd spread what canvas he had left and head for Buffalo. 'I think,' replied his honor, 'that you need to go into the dry-dock for a thorough overhauling. You need new topsails and repairs to the hull, and I notice that your deck-beams are badly sprung. There's your weather-eye all closed up, half of your reef-points gone, and there's three feet of whisky in the hold. You could probably hold three feet more, but you won't probably smell it for thirty days to come.' 'Then,' continued the prisoner, stretching out his arm, 'may you miss stays with breakers dead ahead!' It was an awful treat, and Bijah told him that as soon as the thirty days were out they'd arrest him on a charge of man slaughter, and send him where Concord grapes were $1 a pound every month in the year."

—JUDGE WILLIAM MCKINDREE BYRD.—The Selma (Ala.) Times of the 25th ult. reports the occurrence of the death of Judge William McK. Byrd, an eminent lawyer of that State. His death was caused the day previous by an accident on the Selma, Rome and Dalton Railroad. Judge Byrd was born in Perry county, Mississippi, on the 1st of December, 1819. He finished his education at Lagrange College, Franklin county, Alabama, where he graduated with distinction in 1838. Soon after he graduated he commenced the study of law with Judge Clayton, Holly Springs, Miss. Having completed his law studies and obtained license to practice, he soon afterward removed to Alabama, and in 1841 he opened a law office and pursued his profession in Linden, Marengo county, until some time in the year 1853, when he removed to Selma, where he still pursued his profession. At Selma he practised law with great diligence and success, until he was elected chancellor of the division in which he resided. In 1865 he was elected one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the State. His decisions while on the supreme court bench were distinguished for their learning and ability. He remained in that high office until 1868, when he was ejected from it by the military authorities of the United States, under the reconstruction acts.

INJUNCTION IN THE STATE COURT AGAINST OFFICER OF FEDERAL COURT.—We print elsewhere an interesting decision of the Supreme Court of Rhode Island, on this important question. We are able to lay this opinion before our readers in consequence of the courtesy of James H. Parsons, Esq., of Providence, who has kindly consented to furnish us, from time to time, with important decisions of the courts of that state.

The Grand Jury System.

In Washington City, Mr. A. A. Hall, a man of good standing in the community, was recently indicted for forging firemen's certificates. At the trial, all the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury were examined, and when their examination was concluded, the district attorney promptly stated that the government had "entirely failed to make out a case." Whereupon the Washington Chronicle makes the following enquires:

> What are we to think of the grand jury system which thus brands a citizen as a criminal without any evidence whatever? What security has any innocent man, no matter what his standing may be, against indictment for a penitentiary offense? How must that jury have been made up, or how manipulated, in order to bring in indictments without evidence of guilt, and thereby brand men as criminals, against whom there was no appearance of criminality?

And the same journal proceeds to say:

> The question does not now arise for the first time. In some of the states the grand jury system has been dispensed with; in others the subject is under consideration. Whether a city like Washington, peculiarly situated as to political relations, and as to classes of population, could as easily rid itself of the system as Vermont or Michigan could, is a question that will bear discussion; but a few cases like that of yesterday will drive thinking men to an active investigation of the whole subject.

The above is a specimen of the thoughtless and injudicious discussions of questions of law reform which we frequently meet with in the daily press. If the writer who penned the above paragraphs had referred to the history of the grand jury system, he would have seen that it was to prevent what this grand jury has done, that grand juries were originally established. It was justly considered that twelve men, selected from the body of the community, would be less apt to hold a citizen for trial for a high crime than one man—the prosecuting officer—appointed by the king, or by the governor, or elected and controlled by a political faction. When we consider that twelve grand jurors must, on their oaths, concur in every presentment or indictment, and that it is (other things being equal) twelve times as easy to bribe one man as it is to bribe twelve men, and that twelve men, selected suddenly from the people at large, will be far less apt to be subject to improper influences than one man who holds his office for a definite period, and whom there is time to approach and improperly influence before any desired action is taken—the wisdom of the grand jury system is fully vindicated.

Beside, it is doubtless true that, if the grand jury has been abolished in any state, it has been in deference to a clamor for less expenditure in the administration of justice, and not on account of abuses of the system, such as that which happened in the above case. On the other hand, it is confidently believed that whenever the propriety of abolishing grand juries has been agitated, the principal reason which has been urged in favor of retaining them, is that the system is a security to the citizen against the abuse which the above writer complains of.

Finally, we do not see how the abuse, which happened in this paticular case can be imputed to the grand jury system. Unless the law in the District of Columbia is entirely different from what we have been accustomed to, this was not a case in which the grand jury possessed inquisitorial powers—that is, in which they could send for persons and papers and prefer a presentment on their own motion; but it was a case in which, before they could act, it was necessary for the district attorney to investigate it, to draw an indictment and to send it before them, with the government's witnesses. Before taking these steps, it was the duty of this officer to satisfy himself that there was such probable cause as would justify the government in putting the person accused on trial. The primary fault, then, was his, and the case was one in which the grand jury may have abdicated their functions in deference to his opinion. If there had been no grand jury, and if the system of proceeding upon the information of the government's attorney had been in vogue instead, the result would have been the same. An officer who would send an indictment to the grand jury, would, under the same circumstances, prefer an information to the judge.

But this discussion is idle, so far as the District of Columbia is concerned; for the system of criminal procedure in that district, is controlled by the 5th amendment to the federal constitution, which declares that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger." It follows that before the grand jury system can be abolished in the District of Columbia, either that district must be erected into a state, or the above constitutional amendment must be abrogated.

Seduction.

We are permitted to make the following extract from a note by Mr. Bigelow, to appear in his forthcoming Leading Cases on Torts. It will be observed that that portion of it which shows that in awarding damages in seduction the jury are not confined to the pecuniary loss suffered by the parent, but may take into consideration the disgrace brought upon his family, bears some analogy to the point lately under discussion in the JOURNAL concern ing damages in the law of slander (ante, pp. 424, 455).

Mr. Bigelow's note is appended to the case of Martin v. Payne, 9 Johns. 387, the case usually cited for the American doctrine, that a parent may maintain an action for the seduction of his infant daughter, though at the time of the seduction she was engaged in the service of another, and had no intention to return to the plaintiff; provided that the situation of the daughter was merely permissive on the part of the parent, and not binding. We now give the extract:

The doctrine of the English case, Dean v. Peel, 5 East, 45, which makes the criterion of recovery in an action for seduction to depend upon the animus revertendi, where the daughter was living out at service (though still subject to the parent's authority and control) when seduced, has been generally repudiated in this country, and that of Martin v. Payne followed. But the allegation of service, though generally but little more than a fiction, is nevertheless held indisputable; and it must appear that the parent, whatever or wherever the situation of the daughter, had at the time of the seduction the right to control the daughter's services. If his power over her is gone at that time, whether by his own consent in emancipating her, or by the act of law in taking her away from him, he cannot maintain the action; though there has been some conflict upon this point, in case of the return of the infant to the parent after seduction, as will appear in a subsequent part of this note. See Sargent v. ——, 5 Cowen, 106, 116. But if he be not divested of his authority, the action will be maintainable, though the daughter be away from home at the time, and have no intention of returning. So, too, if the parent was divested of his power over the infant by the defendant's fraud, the action may be maintained. Speight v. Oliviera, 2 Stark. 493; Dain v. Wycoff, 7 N. Y. 191.

The doctrine of Martin v. Payne, has been followed in the following among many cases: Hornketh v. Barr, 8 Serg. & R. 36; Clark v. Fitch, 2 Wend. 459; Stiles v. Tilford, 10 Wend. 338; Mulvehall v. Millward, 11 N. Y. 343; and we are not aware of any case in this country in which a contrary ruling has been made.

In many of the cases, indeed, the fiction of service is spoken of with disfavor; but the necessity of proving the right to the services is not denied. Proof of acts of service, however, is not required; the right to the service is sufficient. And this is true even in England, where the courts have always been more strict in requiring proof of service than in this country. See Terry v. Hutchinson, Law R. 3 Q. B. 599, 602, Blackburn, J.; though this was a case in which the daughter was in fact returning to her father when seduced, after having been dismissed from the service of another.

Upon this point see also the language of Bronson, C. J., in Bartley v. Richtmyer, 4 Comst. 38, 47. After stating that several unsuccessful attempts had been made in England to maintain this action upon other grounds than the right of service, he says: "Our cases stand upon the same foundation, with only this difference, that we go further than the English courts in making out the constructive relation of master and servant, and hold that it may exist for the purposes of this action, although the daughter was in the service of a third person at the time of the seduction, provided the case be such that the father then had a legal right to her services, and might have commanded them at pleasure."

It follows, a fortiori, that where the infant daughter, when seduced, is only absent from her father upon a visit, the action is maintainable. See Griffiths v. Teetgen, 15 Com. B. 344; Bartley v. Richtmyer, 4 Comst. 38, 44.

And this is true even of an adult daughter, if the relation of master and servant continue to exist. Sutton v. Huffman, 3 Vroom, 58. It was said in this case that the arrival at majority does not emancipate the child if the parent continue to exercise authority, and the child to submit to it; emancipation being a question of fact, to be determined by the circumstances of the case and the intention of the parties. And the same doctrine was held in Lipe v. Eisenlerd, 32 N. Y. 229. See also Brown v. Ramsay, 5 Dutch. 117.

Upon this point Parker v. Meek, 3 Sneed, 29, went too far, since that case the (adult) daughter was seduced in the lifetime of her father, and the action was brought afterwards by her mother,—a point to be considered upon a subsequent page. (It is not reached in this extract).

Of course, where the daughter is of age when seduced, no action can be maintained if she no longer continue to submit to the authority of the parent, which shows again that the right of the service is at the foundation of the action. See Nicklson v. Stryker, 10 Johns. 115; Miller v. Thompson, 1 Wend. 447; Lee v. Hodges, 13 Gratt. 726; Manly v. Field, 7 Com. B. N. S. 96; Sutton v. Huffman, supra.

With respect to the damages to be allowed in this action, there has been, apparently, a departure from the principle upon which the action is based, the loss of service; for it was said so long ago as in Lord Ellenborough's time, that the practice had become inveterate of giving damages far beyond the value of the daughter's services as a well person. Irwin v. Dearman, 11 East, 23. In this case the only actual damage proved by the plaintiff was the loss of the young woman's service for five weeks, during the time of her absence in the parish work-house where she was confined. But the jury gave £100 damages; and the verdict was upheld, and this, too, though the young woman was only an adopted child.

Mr. Justice Blackburn, approving of the doctrine of this case, says: "In effect, the damages are given to the plantiff as standing in the relation of parent; and the action has, at present, no reference to the relation of master and servant, beyond the mere technical point in which the action is founded." And further on, in the same opinion, he observes: "As to the amount of damages, I hold that now the jury are to consider the injuiy as done to the natural guardian, and all that can be referred to that relation. I do not say that they ought to calculate the actual cost of the maintenance of the grandchild, though they cannot well exclude that fact; but they may consider not only that the plaintiff has a daughter disgraced in the eyes of the neighbors, but that there is also a living memorial of the disgrace in a bastard grandchild. Considering this, are £150 damages too much? I cannot say that they are." And the other judges were of like opinion. But it was still considered necessary that the relation of master and servant should exist to give the right of action. Terry v. Hutchinson, Law R. 3 Q. B. 599, 602. See also as to the question of damages, Ingersoll v. Jones, 5 Barb. 661; Bartley v. Richtmeyer, 4 Comst. 38, 49; Damon v. Moore, 5 Laws, 454; Sargent v.—— 5 Cowen, 106; Badgley v. Decker, 44 Barb. 577; Moran v. Dawes, 4 Cowen. 412; Stiles v. Tilford, 10 Wend. 338.

The principle seems to be, that the matter of service is essential to the action, but that, when this has been established by showing the parent's right of control, the court has jurisdiction to proceed beyond the mere loss of the services, and award damages for the disgrace brought upon the family.

It has been held that if there be no seduction, and the intercourse be effected without objection, or the use of insinuating arts, this will be admissible evidence in mitigation of damages. Hogan v. Cregan, 6 Rob. (N. Y.) 138. But quære, if even then the plaintiff can never recover damages beyond the loss of service; the disgrace to the family would usually be greater in such a case, than when an unwillingness of the daughter had to be overcome. If this disgrace can be taken into consideration at all, what difference ean it make whether the daughter was quite willing or not, unless she was notoriously loose and had already disgraced her family? The above case of Hogan v. Cregan was disapproved in Damon v. Moore, 5 Lans. 454, as to the ruling that actual seduction was necessary to the giving of exemplary damages. In Damon v. Moore the alleged seduction was accompanied with force.

Injunction in State Court Against Officer of Federal Court.

Supreme Court, State of Rhode Island, March Term, A. D. 1874.

A state court will not award an injunction to restrain an officer of a United States ourt from selling property levied on under process of such court. And this is so, although the ground on which the injunction is sought, is that the property levied on is that of a person who was not a party to the suit in which the judgment was rendered. In such acase the application must be to the court whose process is abused. [Acc. Freeman v Howe, 24 Howard, 450, 457; Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wallace, 334, 341; Brooks v. Montgomery, 23 La. An. 450.]

James Tillinghast, Benjamin T. Eames and Charles Hart, for complainant; J. H. Parsons and Thomas A. Jenckes, for respondents.

POTTER, J.—In this case the defendant admits having obtained from the United States Circuit Court, in a suit in equity, judgment against the Atlantic Delaine Company, took out her execution, and it was in pursuance of an order of her attorneys, Messrs. Jenckes and Parsons, indorsed thereon, levied by the United States marshal on the property of the present complainant, Josiah Chapin, it being claimed that he was a stockholder in the said corporation at the time the liability accrued, and that they had the right so to levy it by the provisions of the statute of Rhode Island regulating manufacturing corporations.

The said Chapin now files his bill in this court for an injunction against the United States marshal, to restrain him from selling the property levied on.

Mrs. James, by Messrs. Jenckes and Parsons, now moves that the bill be dismissed, for two reasons:

First. For want of proper service. That Mrs. James was not a resident of Rhode Island, but of Pennsylvania; and the only service was by leaving a copy at a place alleged to be her last and usual place of abode, whereas she had none in this state, and by service on Messrs. Jenckes and Parsons, who say that they were, and are, attorneys in the suit in the United States Court, but have no authority to accept service or appear for her in the present suit.

It is contended by Messrs. Jenckes and Parsons that the right to order substituted service applies only where relief is asked against a suit at law (this being a suit in equity), and that its validity depends on the old English chancery practice, and not on the new English practice as modified by their recent statutes.

We cannot see the validity of this objection. The power of this court to order service on persons out of the state, depends not on any old practice, but on General Statutes, cap. 181, § 25, which is sufficient to include the present case, if the court has jurisdiction of the property relations or person involved in controversy. So in England, substituted service depends now not on the old practice, but on the act of 1852, Stat. 15-16 Victoria, c. 86. See the subject commented on in Hope v. Hope, 4 De Gex, McNaughton & Gordon, 328, 341.

Second. The second ground for dismissal is, that the state court has no jurisdiction in the case.

The complainant contends that in the present case, so far as concerns the levy on real estate, the property cannot be considered as in possession of the United States Court. That the complainant, Chapin, was not a party to the suit, and that even if he was liable as a stockholder, the marshal has no right, on an execution against the corporation, to levy the execution on his property, inasmuch as the mode of proceeding provided in the Manufacturing Corporations Act has never been adopted by any United States statutes or rule of court; that the execution was issued on a judgment in a suit for tort, whereas the stockholder is only liable in case of contract; that Mrs. James, being a stockholder herself, was not entitled to that process, and that there is no remedy for the the complainant unless this court interferes.

The facts alleged being assumed as true for the purpose of deciding the present motion to dismiss, cannot the complainant raise in the United States Circuit Court all these and other questions of law he may make, and have them decided by that court?

Although a decree has been made in the suit in the United States Circuit Court, the case is still pending there. The execution is the process of the court for carrying its decree into effect, and except so far as regulated by statute, is still within the court's control. Courts of law, anciently, by "audita querela" and on motion, and latterly more generally by motion, have exercised control over their final process, and courts of equity have always done so. This is absolutely necessary to prevent the execution of a judgment or decree in one suit giving rise to a dozen other suits growing out of questions as to the mode of serving its process. The suit is not ended by the judgnent; it is still pending. Wegman v. Childs, 41 New York, 159; Mann v. Blount, 65 N. Carolina, 99, 101; Howell et al. v. Bowers, 2 Crompt., Mees. & Roscoe, 621; Spann et al. v. Spann, 2 Hill's S. Car. Chanc. Rep. 156. So far as the present controversy is concerned, the question is between courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction. The suit was in equity, and might have been brought either in the United States or in the state court; and it is a principle too well settled to need authority, that, in such case, the court which first acquires jurisdiction is to retain it, and is not to be interfered with by any other co-ordinate court, and that property in possession of the officers of the court is in possession of the court, and cannot be levied on by officers under authority of any other court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, whether state or federal. Hagan v. Lucas, 10 Peters, 400; Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Peters, 136; Smith v. McIver, 9 Wheaton, 532; Mallett v. Dexter, 1 Curtis, 178; Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wallace, 304, 341. Says Mr. Justice McLean, in Hagan v. Lucas: "A most injurious conflict of jurisdiction would be likely often to arise between the federal and the state courts, if the final process of the one could be levied on property which had been taken by process of the other." In that case the United States marshal had levied on property previously attached by the state sheriff.

And see also the remarks of Judge Grier on the jurisdiction of the federal and state courts in ex parte Jenkins, 2 Wallace, Jr., 521-525. And as between state and United States courts it is well settled that, as a general rule, neither can enjoin the process of the other. strong expressions of the majority of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Taylor v. Carryl, 20 Howard, 583, 596.

But it is said by the complainant that in this case an execution issued against A. has been levied on B.'s property, and that in such a case a state court may interfere; and he cites 1 Kent Comment. 410, supported by Cropper v. Coburn, 2 Curtis, 465; Greene v. Briggs, 1 Curtis, 311. The latter was the case of liquor seized by an officer, under a state law, which said Greene replevied out of the possession of the state officer, on a writ brought to the United States Circuit Court. In that case the question of jurisdiction was not raised.

Judge Kent cites as his authority, Bruen v. Ogden, 6 Halsted N. Jersey Law Rep. 370, which was a case of replevin, and Dunn v. Vail, 7 La. Term R. 416; 3 Martin, La. Rep. 602, which latter was an action of trespass where there could be no actual conflict of jurisdiction, and therefore is no authority for us.

The doctrine contended for by complainant was also held by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in a replevin case. Howe v. Freeman, 14 Gray, 566. But this case was carried up to the Supreme Court of the United States and there reversed; (Freeman v. Howe, 24 Howard, 450, 457); where the opinon was delivered by Nelson, J., one of the oldest and most learned and experienced justices of that court.. This case, as observed by Mr. Justice Miller (3 Wallace, 341), took the profession by surprise, as overruling the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts and the opinion of Chancellor Kent. But it was upon this very point, expressly affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wallace, 334, 341. It is said that the marshal, on execution against A., has no right to levy on the property of B., which is claimed to be the present case. The very point decided in these two latter cases was, that in such a case the court from which the process issues, must, of necessity, decide the question, and the case of Brooks v. Montgomery, 23 La. Ann. 450, is exactly in point. The decision there was that the state court would not enjoin the United States marshal from selling property, on the ground that the property was not the property of the defendant in the original suit, but of the person who applies for the injunction. It is asked, if the marshal, on a writ against A. should arrest B., would not the state court grant relief? We think in that case the application should be to the court whose process is abused. Suppose, for instance, a case of disputed identity. The court issuing the process could decide it, and it could only lead to an unseemly conflict for another court to interfere.

It is to be observed that there is a great distinction between actions of replevin and injunctions, which actually interfere with the process of a court, and actions of trespass and case where damages only are claimed against an officer, in which latter there is no danger of conflict, and which may be peaceably taken from the state court to the United States Supreme Court, whose decision is final. Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wallace, 334, 343, 347.

It is argued that in actions of trespass and case the claimant only recovers damages, whereas he ought to be protected in the possession of the property itself. The same argument was urged in Freeman v. Howe, and was overruled.

It is said that here Chapin was not a party to the original suit, but was a stranger to it, and could have no remedy in the United States Circuit Court, growing out of the peculiar limitations on their jurisdiction over parties.

In a state court, and so also in the United States court, but for the limitation as to citizenship, there can be no doubt that even a stranger, who had suffered from the execution of a decree, might obtain relief by petition to the court for an order in the case. 1 Hoff. Chanc. Prac. 89; Platto v. Deuster, 22 Wiscon. 482, 485, citing M'Chord's Heirs v. McClintock, 5 Littell, Kentucky, 304, where a person, not a party to a suit, who had been turned out of possession on the execution was relieved by petition in the same suit. See also Dyckman v. Kernochan, 2 Paige, 26; Spann et al. v. Spann, 2 Hill, S. Car. Chanc. 156; Lane v. Clark, 1 Clarke (N. Y.), Chanc. Rep. 307–9. And as to the United States courts it seems to be settled by the case of Freeman v. Howe, 24 Howard, 450, 460, that where the process was in a suit at law, a bill on the equity side of the court would lie to regulate or restrain proceedings, and that such a bill would be not original but ancillary, and might be brought by any one whose interests were affected by the process. And while limiting the relief to parties before the court, or who may come before it, the same court, by Mr. Justice Miller, in Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. 334, 345, laid down the same rule, viz.: that persons interested in the possession of the property in custody of the court, may, by petition make themselves so far parties as to have their interests protected, although, if it was an original suit, the qualifications as to citizenship would not be such as to give the federal courts jurisdiction. See also Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Peters, 1; and Kendall v. Winsor, 6 R. I. 453. In Christmas v. Russel, 14 Wall. 69, 80, there are some remarks which might seem to throw doubt on this view but for the very peculiar circumstances of that case.

The motion for a preliminary injunction must, therefore, be dismissed.

INJUNCTION DISALLOWED.

NOTE.—The property levied on in the above case was real property. In the same case a preliminary injunction was refused by Mr. District Judge Knowles, sitting in the United States Circuit Court, to restrain the sale of personal property which had been levied on. The opinion of the learned judge in that case is before us. He quotes the following language of the court in the Earth Closet Company v. Ferner, 5 Fisher's Patent Cases, 15, as indicating the nature of the discretion of the court on applications of this character, and, upon an examination of the merits, concludes that an adequate remedy for any injury done, exists against the officer and his sureties; that the principles of equity relating to "cloud upon title," have no reference to personal property, and that a preliminary injunction ought not to be granted:

"A motion for a preliminary injunction is one of the class addressed in technical parlance to the discretion of the court. For precedents, in any recognized sense of that word, it is therefore idle to search. By one judge, an injunction may be granted to-day under a given state of facts, and by another be refused to-morrow, upon identically the same state of facts, and yet neither functionary be chargeable with even error in judgment. The law makes the judge's discretion the rule, not unheedful that in the qualities of mind which give character to an exercise of discretion, individuals differ scarcely less than in form and features. The judge is bound to decide a question of this kind as in his judgment, upon the particular case before him, the principles of equity and the practice of its courts warrant or dictate, and this whether his decision be in accord or at variance with that of his brother officer, of whatever grade or whatever locality. The largest liberty imaginable is his, practically, 'with no rules to restrain — no after-reckonings to dread.' Neither upon appeal, nor by writ of error, nor even by petition for revisory action, can a judge's rulings or orders upon a motion for a preliminary injunction be subjected to correction or even criticism on the part of his superiors in official position or in judicial acumen." This opinion, sub nom. Chaffee v. Coggshall, will be found in full in 6 Legal Gazette, 342.

Liability where Coupon Tickets are Purchased of one Company, and the Passenger is Killed on a Connecting Line.

NASHVILLE AND CHATTANOOGA RAILROAD CO. v. W. L. SPRAYBERRY.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, September 26, 1874.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY,
" ROBERT MCFARLAND,
" JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
" THOS. J. FREEMAN,
" JOHN L. T. SNEED,

The plaintiff purchased from an agent of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, at Chattanooga, coupon tickets for himself, wife and children from that place to Shreveport, Louisiana. While en route, on board a steamboat belonging to the last connecting line embraced in the tickets, an accident occurred, in which his wife and two children were drowned. Held, that an action will not lie against the company selling the tickets. The owners of the steamboat are not to be regarded as the servants or agents of the company selling the tickets, but the latter are to be regarded as the agents of the former.

McFARLAND, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Sprayberry purchased from an agent of the Nashville & Chattanooga R. R. Co., at Chattanooga, tickets for himself, wife and two children, from that place to Shreveport, Louisiana. The tickets are what are known as coupon tickets—and indicated the route to be by the Nashville & Chattanooga road to Nashville—and by other connecting roads to Memphis, and from that point to Shreveport by steamboat. After passing over the railroads to Memphis, the party took the steamboat called the Nick Wall, to which they were directed, and while on the route on the Mississippi river, an accident occurred, in which the wife of Sprayberry and his two children were drowned. This action was brought by Sprayberry against the Nashville & Chattanooga R. R. Co.; the drowning is averred to have been the result of the misconduct and want of skill of the officers and servants of the boat. A demurrer was filed upon the ground that the plaintiff could not maintain the action in his own name, for wrongs or injuries causing the death of the wife and children. This, we think, was properly overruled. An action of this character is unknown to common law, and is only given by statute, and where such an action is given by statute, and a remedy prescribed, that remedy must be pursued. As the injury occurred in the state of Mississippi, the right of action and the remedy prescribed by the statute of that state, is the one to which the plaintiff was entitled. The statute of this state on the subject has no application. The action, though predicated upon the Mississippi statute, may be brought in this state. In such case, the declaration must aver the statute under which it is brought. This was sufficiently done. That statute gives the remedy to the husband and father—and we enforce that remedy in our courts.

The next question, and one of importance, is as to the liability of the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad Company for injuries to the passengers caused by the wrongful acts, negligence or want of skill in the officers and servants of the steamboat, after the passengers had passed beyond their line. The declaration avers that the defendant was in partnership with the company or line of carriers owning the boat. This was put in issue. The judge, in his charge, instructed the jury, in substance, that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove this to entitle him to a recovery, but if the plaintiff purchased the tickets from an authorized agent of the defendant, the defendant thereby became bound for the transportation of the passengers over the entire line for which the tickets were sold, although beyond the terminus of its own road. That the company selling the tickets incurs a responsibility as though the entire route was its own—unless it stipulate at the time for a less responsibility. This we understand to be the substance of the instructions to the jury on this question. This doctrine rests upon the theory that the contract is alone with the company from whom the tickets were purchased for the entire route, and that the connecting lines are but agents of the first in carrying out this contract; and as a consequence, the acts or negligence of the servants causing the injury, are the acts of the joint company. This is laid down as the true doctrine in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, sec. 272, though it is conceded that the American cases do not always support it. The cases referred to in support of the position, we have not had an opportunity to examine. In the case of Carter and Hough v. Peck, 4 Sneed, 202, the language of the judge delivering the opinion of the court, seems to favor this view. In that case, however, it appeared that the plaintiff purchased from the defendants, the proprietors of a stage line, through tickets from Nashville to Memphis. The defendants did not own the entire line, but had an arrangement with another company owning a stage line, to receive the passengers at Waynesboro, on the route, and carry them to La Grange, for their share of the fare, from which point they were to be taken to Memphis by railway, but this arrangement was not known to the plaintiff. The connecting line at Waynesboro failed and refused to carry the plaintiff, and he was compelled to pay his fare upon another route. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to hold the first company liable for this failure, upon the ground that this contract was alone with them.

The case of Fustenhiem v. The Memphis & Ohio R. R. Co., decided at Jackson, by this court, in April, 1872, was this: The plaintiff purchased a through ticket from New York to Memphis, from the Pennsylvania Central R. R. Co., and received a check for his baggage to be delivered at Memphis. It was held that upon this the plaintiff could not recover from the last company running into Memphis, for an injury to his baggage, which occurred while on the Pennsylvania Central road; for this injury he must look to that company. We are also referred to several cases, and one of them, our own, holding that a carrier receiving freight to be carried beyond the terminus of its own road, is responsible for its delivery at that point, unless a different liability is stipulated for—and there are, as stated, authorities holding that the same rule applies to passengers.

On the other hand, there are authorities holding that a different rule applies to passengers from the rule applicable to freight and baggage. That where tickets of this character are sold they are to be regarded as distinct tickets for each road, sold by the first company as agent of the others, so far as passengers are concerned. This is the doctrine maintained by Judge Redfield in his work on carriers. He refers, among others, to the case of Ellsworth v. Tartt, 26 Ala. 733, in which he says the question was a good deal examined, and the rule laid down to be, "if the proprietors of different portions of a public line of travel, by an agreement among themselves, appoint a common agent at each end of the route to receive the fare and give through tickets, this does not of itself constitute them partners as to passengers, so as to render each one liable for losses occurring upon any portion of the line." He refers also to other authorities. See Redfield on Carriers, Sec. 444. And the same author maintains the same doctrine in his work on the Law of Railways, Vol. 2, Sec. 201.

In this conflict of authority we are left to adopt the rule which seems to us supported by the soundest reasons.

The extent and termini of great railway lines, owned and operated by companies incorporated by public laws, may be supposed to be known, at least in general, to persons of ordinary intelligence, when they purchase tickets to travel over them, especially when this is shown by the tickets themselves. The system of selling through tickets is one of great importance and convenience to travelers, as it avoids trouble, besides securing in some instance lower rates. The theory that the company selling the ticket shall be held, from this alone to have actually contracted to carry the passengers over roads besides its own, and that the owners of the other roads are but the agents of the first to carry out the contract, seems to us to be an arbitrary assumption—a sort of legal fiction, and contrary, in some cases at least, to the truth of the case. Assuming that in fact the different lines of road are separate and distinct, and owned and controlled by different companies, with different agents and officers, and that there is no contract or priority between them in regard to carrying passengers, except the arrangement to sell through tickets, and that these facts appear in proof shall the fact that the first company, with the authority of the others, issues and sells the tickets, be held of itself to establish exactly contrary to the truth, that the other companies are but the agents and servants of the first? There is nothing in this record to indicate that the officers and agents of the steamboat, whose wrongful acts or negligence are said to have caused the death of the plaintiff's wife and children, were the servants of this defendant, or in any manner under its control, except the simple fact that the defendant sold the tickets. To allow this of itself to establish this arbitrary conclusion against the truth, would be to attach unjust reponsibility upon the company selling the tickets. We are of opinion that in such cases, the company selling the tickets shall be regarded as the agent of the other lines, when the tickets themselves import this and nothing else appears, and the purchaser may well understand with whom the contract is made, and who is bound for its performance.

Of course the company selling the tickets may, by contract, either expressed or to be fairly implied from its acts, bind itself to be responsible for the entire route; but this should not be held conclusively established from the sale of the tickets alone, nor should it be held to throw upon the defendant the onus of proving that it expressly limited its liability. If a partnership in fact appear, the case would be different. For this error the judgment must be reversed and a new trial awarded. JUDGMENT REVERSED.

NOTE.—We are indebted, for the foregoing opinion, and for another which we shall publish next week, to Mr. Attorney-General Heiskell, of Tennessee.

Railway Mortgage—Foreclosure—Parties.

Before Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Circuit Judge.
and " JOHN LOVE, District Judge.

1. Foreclosure—Trustee—Cumulative Remedy.—A provision in a railway mortgage, authorizing the trustee, on default of the company to pay interest, to take possession of the road, operate it and receive its income, and upon notice, to sell it, is a cumulative remedy, and does not affect the right to foreclosure by bill in equity.

2. ——. Trust Deed Construed.—The special provision of the deed of trust in question, held not to require a majority of the bondholders to unite in a suit to foreclose for interest, or request the trustee to bring such suit.

3. ——. Default of Trustee—Who may Sue.—If a trustee improperly refuses to bring such suit, an individual bondholder may bring it for himself and others, and make the trustee a party defendant.

4. ——. Suit by Trustee—When Permitted.—On a dismissal, by the plaintiff of the bill as to the trustee, the court has a discretion to allow the trustee to file a bill for the benefit of all the bondholders.

This is a bill in equity to foreclose a mortgage made by the defendant on its railroad and property. The bill is filed by the plaintiffs as bondholders, who allege that they bring it for themselves and all other bondholders who are similarly situated. It charges default in the company to pay interest. It alleges that the plaintiffs have made a demand on the trustee in the mortgage, viz: the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York, to bring the suit, and its refusal, and the said company is therefore made a defendant. There is no averment in the bill that a majority of the bondholders unite in bringing it, or united in the request to the trustee to bring it. The trustee appears and files an answer, setting up that a majority of the bondholders have never demanded action on the part of the trustee, and that it is willing to submit to the direction of the court as to its duty in the premises, and to become plaintiff if the court so orders. The railroad company demurred to the bill, on the ground that under the provisions of the deed of trust, there could be no foreclosure by bondholders, or by the trustee, unless a majority of the bondholders so desired, and there was no such averment.

The following are the provisions in the deed of trust relied on in support of the demurrer: "And the said party of the first part [the Railroad Co.] doth hereby covenant, promise and agree, for itself, its successors or assigns, to and with the said trustee, their successor or successors, that the said company will well and truly pay each and every of said bonds issued by them, and secured by this mortgage, together with the semi-annual interest to become due thereon, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, at the times, in the manner, and at the places specified therein, in United States gold coin. And that in case said company shall, for the space of six months, make default in the payment of the said semi-annual interest to become due upon any, either or the whole of of said mortgage bonds, then, after the expiration of twelve months from the time it became due, and without demand or notice, at the election or option of a majority of the holders of said bonds, the whole principal sum mentioned in each and all of the said mortgage bonds then outstanding shall, forthwith, become due and payable, and the lien or incumberance hereby created for the security and payment thereof may at once be enforced.

And it is agreed, in case of the default of the payment of the semi-annual interest, as above provided, that said trustee, or its successors, is hereby expressly authorized and empowered, upon the request in writing of a majority of the owners or holders of said bonds, to enter into and upon, and to take actual possession of all the property, real and personal, and rights, franchises and privileges of the premises hereby conveyed, and each and every part thereof, and by their agents or attorneys, have, hold, use, and enjoy the same, and from time to time make all repairs and replacements, and all useful alterations, additions and improvements thereto, as fully as the parties of the first part might have done before such entry; and to collect and receive all tolls, freight, incomes, rents, issues, and profits of the same and of every part thereof; and the said trustee, and their successors, shall and may, and hereby is expressly authorized and empowered to sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, the entire property, real and personal, rights, franchises, and privileges herein conveyed; said sale shall be either in the city of Marshalltown, Iowa, or in the city of New York."

Platt Smith and J. F. Duncombe, for the plaintiffs; Boardman & Brown, for the railroad company; Grant & Smith, for the trustee.

DILLON, Circuit Judge:—

1. The authority in the deed of trust to the trustee, on default of the payment of interest, and upon the written request of a majority of the bondholders to take possession of the road, to operate it and receive its income, and on three months' notice to sell the same, and divide the proceeds of the sale pro rata among the bondholders, is a cumulative remedy for the benefit of the mortgage creditors, and does not exclude their right to resort to the judicial tribunals for a foreclosure. Especially is this so, as the laws of the state of Iowa, forbid sales under powers of this character by proceedings out of court.

2. Provisions in an instrument of this character limiting the right of a mortgage-creditor to resort to a court of chancery to foreclose his security, are not to be extended beyond the fair meaning of the language used; and it is our opinion that there is no restriction in the deed of trust before us, upon the right of the coupon-holder to forclose for interest upon default; although a majority of the bondholders do not unite in the suit, or request the trustees to bring it. The provision in question gives a majority of the bondholders, on default of the payment of interest, the option or election, after the expiration of a year from the default, to have the whole principal sum become due at once, and the mortgage security enforced accordingly. This is not inconsistent with the unabridged right of any coupon-holder to foreclose for interest, in the manner sought in the present bill, and it was not necessary that a majority of the coupon-holders should unite in bringing the bill, or in a request to the trustee to bring it.

3. As the bill alleges that the trustee refused to bring suit, the bill was properly brought in the name of the plaintiffs, for themselves and the other coupon-holders, making the trustee a defendant.

4. If the plaintiffs elect to dismiss the bill as to the trustee, we will allow the trustee to become a party plaintiff, and to file a bill for the benefit of all the bondholders; but it would be anomalous to have the trustee on the record, both as defendant and plaintff in the same proceeding. The demurrer of the railroad company to the bill is overruled. ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

HON. PETER W. GRAY, one of the most eminent lawyers and citizens of Texas, died at Houston, on the 5th instant. He had but recently returned from Virginia, where he had gone for his health. He was born in Fredericksburgh, Va., in 1817, and accompanied his father to Texas in 1837.

[Correspondence.]

James T. Brady.

The great men of the nation—those who have given the world a direction towards the good — are endearing and enduring ornaments.

To rescue from forgetfulness, to keep fresh and green the memory, and to cherish with just pride the names of those who have elevated and ennobled a beneficent calling, ever tends to raise mankind to a higher level of thought and action.

We recur with pleasing recollections—after a lapse of several years since his death—to him who did all that lay in his power, and his bounty was large, to alleviate the condition of the unfortunate, to vindicate the rights of man, and to adorn the profession he so dearly loved.

James T. Brady was indeed a brilliant ornament—the Curran of the New York bar—while in the social circle he was peculiarly attractive, possessing at the same time, in a liberal degree, the better amenities of our nature. Genial, gentle, and sympathetic, he was always considerate and generous toward his younger brethren of the bar. Companionable and noble, and largely endowed with the spirit of love for his fellow-men, he was ever the delight of his auditory, whether in the court-room, or before a popular audience.

And a festive gathering, in many of which he figured so delightfully, was considered incomplete—a play without a star—if he were absent; for he was

> "From the charmed council to the festive board,
> Of human feelings the unbounded lord."

His boyhood education was under the guidance and direction of his father, Thomas Brady, who was a man of clever legal abilities and varied accomplishments, having kept a school and afterwards practiced law with success, in the city of New York. In that rudimentary school, it was about fifty years ago, that young Brady might have been seen, a large-headed little boy of seven or nine years of age, poring over his books, and laggingly committing his lessons, for he was "slow of study" at that age, as was Webster and many others, who, in manhood, became distinguished; he displayed no marked, distinctive qualities of mind or genius while a youth, which foreshadowed eminence in coming years.

"I remember him," says Chief Justice Daly, now of the Common Pleas Court of New York, who was with him while a boy in the school of his father. "I remember him, and such of his schoolmates as survived remember him, as a great, warm-hearted little boy; exceedingly unselfish, most affectionate in his attachments to his young school companions, and exceedingly beloved by them; qualities, which in all his subsequent career, and the distinction that attended him, were never abated or extinguished, as every one will testify that ever knew him, nor came in personal contact with him."

Although he was a shy and retiring lad, his father—who knew his nature best—regarded him as a self-reliant and remarkable boy, who was one day to make a figure in the world.

From the impressions of those who remember him in early manhood, we glean that, his earliest ambition was to be a lawyer; and he ever after had an elevated opinion of the nobleness of the profession; he considered that the beauties and honors of Justitia far out-shone the wealth of "Ormus and of Ind."

His natural powers of oratory were great, while an unhesitating command of language and a wonderful felicity of classical illustration, favored and marked him, even from the time he pleaded his first case; these made him engaging and majestic before any audatory.

Of a Celtic origin, he partook largely of the fervid imagination and flowery style peculiar to that race. In his later efforts he displayed such genius, such astuteness and eloquence as to render him worthy to tread in the footsteps of Thomas Addis Emmet and kindred lights of the bar.

When young Brady was admitted to practice, the profession was as now, we doubt not, crowded, or seemed to be; for such men as George Wood, Daniel Lord, David Graham and Ogden Hoffman, filled the higher places, the labyrinths of the profession; but the proud, self-reliant young knight, sprang into the arena undaunted, ready to cope with the ablest of them—doubtless believing, with Webster, in regard to the profession, that there was "room enough up stairs."

His influence over a jury was very great—probably equal to that of Choate in his palmiest days. While he had a pleasing address, he possessed a remarkable magneticalness which ever wins a jury more than labored logic; these, combined with great felicity of thought and expression, which at times pierced like a Damascus blade to the centre, gave him a powerful lever to distinction. And thus it was, that a gleam of light and beauty shone through whatever he gave his mind to, and made the subject or contested point stand out in radiant characters. But while his diction and eloquence were ever conceded to be remarkable, his powers of analysis, logic and solid argument can but deeply impress the mind of any one who may take occasion to read his forensic speeches, and such of his briefs, legal pleas and arguments as are preserved to us. It has well been said by one who knew him better, that in this regard, "many of his noblest productions were not unlike the Corinthian pillar, in which the strenghth of the column is lost sight of in the symmetry of its proportions and the beauty of its decoration."

While not insensible to his own merits, he was generously ready to accord a word of praise to his associate or antagonist in a cause where he deemed it deserving.

The Great Advocate was engaged in most of the important cases in the state of New York, during a period of twenty-five years. It were idle to attempt to collate in order the various cases in which he figured, but some may be mentioned as they occur to us—as we remember the impressions made at the time of their occurrence.

In 1862 Mr. Brady was one of the counsel to defend the commander and crew of the privateer Savannah, who were arraigned for piracy. The facts in brief were, that the schooner Savannah, a Confederate vessel, having captured the brig Joseph, laden with sugar, was afterward taken by the United States brig-of-war Perry, and brought into the port of New York, where a "true bill" for piracy was found. We may mention in this connection that, as a short time before this, the men of the privateer Jefferson Davis, had been tried in Philadelphia and convicted of piracy, a precedent in such cases had been established.

Mr. Brady handled the cause with marked ability, and as far as we have been able to learn, without pecuniary reward. The closing sentence of his plea to the jury in behalf of the privateermen was about as follows: "I do wish that it were within the power of men, invoking the Great Ruler of the Universe, to bid these doors open and to let the revolutionary sages to whom I have referred, and a Sumter, a Moultrie, a Greene, a Putnam and the other distinguished men who fought for our privileges and rights in the days of old, march in here and look on this trial. There is not a man of them who would not say to you that you should remember in regard to each these prisoners, as if you were his father, the history of Abraham, when he went to sacrifice his son Isaac on the Mount—the spirit of liberty, the principles of American jurisprudence and the dictates of humanity constituting themselves another angel of the Lord, and saying to you when the immolation was threatened: 'Lay not your hand upon him.'"

He also figured conspicuously in the Forrest divorce case—the accounts of which at the time flooded the newspapers and periodicals of the country. It will be remembered that the cross-firing on the part of the litigants, was kept up for several years—Mr. Forrest having set the ball in motion by an action for divorce—but which finally resulted in Mrs. Forrest recovering judgment for her support from 1850 to 1860, which, in the aggregate, amounted to a large sum—and thus, as was then said, Birnham Wood had come to Dunsinane. Mr. Forrest took an appeal from the final judgment, and from each and every part of any further judgment aud order in the action. In these appeals it was that our advocate acted down to 1862, achieving a world-wide reputation.

In the notorious trial of Gen. Geo. W. Cole, for the murder of Hon. L. Harris Hiscock, at Albany, in December, 1868, James T. Brady won bountiful laurels for the graceful and masterly manner in which he defended the prisoner. Notwithstanding his ill health —he then being under the doctor's care—it is generally conceded that he acquitted himself ably and well, and that his efforts wrought out a vindication of the accused in the minds of the jury. We would not, however, in this commendation, be understood as detracting one jot or tittle from the astuteness, genius and eloquence exhibited by the learned and accomplished gentlemen associated with him on that occasion.

The trial of Cole attracted much attention, and was as renowned in pith and moment as that of Sickles for the murder of Barton Key, years ago in Washington.

In his plea to the jury, Mr. Brady made touching allusions to the heroic services rendered to the nation by the prisoner; that after being decorated with badges of honor, for patriotism and heroism in the services of his country, he turned his footsteps homeward to share his glories with her, for whom he would have laid down his life: "But," in deepest pathos, exclaimed Mr. Brady, "what found he there? Alas! that hearthstone was desecrated; the spoiler had been there. Where joy and brightness had reigned luxuriantly, sorrow and gloom were. That beautiful fabric of domestic love and tranquility was overwhelmed in ruin, and the ravens of dispair were croaking and gloating over the dark desolation. Gentlemen, what is home without its jewels; what is earth without its flowers; what is heaven without its stars." He then makes an apposite simile in referring to Cæsar being struck down in the senate chamber by his best friend. "He, also, experienced the pangs of knowing that it was his most trusted friend that struck him to the heart—

> 'For when the noble Cæsar saw him stab,
> Ingratitude, more strong than traitors' arms,
> Quite vanquished him.'"

Although the plea had very great weight with the jury, some have expressed a disappointment at this effort. It may be Mr. Brady had, on some former occasion, when in the prime of health, been more pleasing and eloquent, but considering the fact that his constitution was then much shattered, we may justly accord a tribute of praise, believing that his decided influence over that jury was the result of a solemn pathos well fortified with convincing logic. A verdict of "not guilty" was rendered.

Our generous advocate was ever ready to defend the ignorant, the weak, the worthy "without money and without price,"—and the field for such labor, be it remembered, in any great metropolis is boundless—so that years before, and at his death, full many a poor, unfortunate man and woman whom he had befriended pronounced him blessed, and would fain have laid upon his bier offerings of adoration.

Whether prosecuting or defending a case for pay, or for charity's sake, he was always faithful,—faithful to his abilities, to his client, and faithful to himself.

He possessed abilities of the peculiar kind and description to have shone favorably in public life, but he uniformly declined political honors. The position of Attorney-General of the United States was once tendered him, but he did not accept it, although it was believed that he would have filled the office gracefully and well.

The gerat advocate having courted the jealous mistress of the law, in early manhood, too assiduously to devote time to the tender passion, passed on through life without having married. He never realized the concealed comforts of "The Hanging of the Crane" —Pendre la cremaillere, so charmingly portrayed by Longfellow, in his poem just published under that title. Had he ever been able to say and realize,

> "O fortunate, O happy day!
> When a new household finds its place
> Among the myriad homes of earth"—

he would doubtless have been a happier, if not a better man. Being of a sunny and mercurial nature, he latterly floated on the tide of fawning and flattering society, in which his smiles were ever courted.

The honorable John R. Brady, the accomplished judge of the Supreme Court of New York, is a brother of the subject of our sketch, a man of marked ability and highly revered.

At the meeting of the members of the bar of New York, in memory of Daniel S. Dickerson, one great advocate pronounced a sentiment which appositely illustrates his catholic spirit and humane character: "Like you," he observed with a high sense of regard for the opinion of his associates, "I honor greatness, genius, and achievements; but I honor more those qualities in a man's nature which show that, while he holds a proper relation to the Deity, he has also a just estimate of his fellow-men, and a kindly feeling toward them. I would rather have it said of me after death, by my brethren of the bar, that they were sorry I had left their companionship, than to be spoken of in the highest strains of gifted panegyric." That sentence bespeaks the nature of the man.

Five winters and summers have rolled their onward course since James T. Brady was called from his beneficient sphere of usefulness,—since a void was occasioned in the Bar of New York, which has scarcely yet been redeemed—and thousands still miss his companionship.—

> "Nor e'er was to the bowers of bliss convey'd
> A fairer spirit, or more welcome shade."

CRIMINAL LAW REPORTS: Being Reports of Cases Determined in the Federal and State Courts of the United States, and in the Courts of England, Ireland, Canada, Etc. With Notes. By N. ST. JOHN GREEN, formerly Lecturer on Criminal Law at the Dane Law School, and now Lecturer on Criminal Law at the School of Law of Boston University. New York: Published by Hurd & Houghton. Cambridge: The Riverside Press. 1874.

We are glad that the preparation of a series of criminal law reports has been undertaken by an editor so competent to perform the task, and by publishers who stand foremost in their department of the book-making art. It is an undertaking of which a large portion of the profession have felt the need for some time, and it is matter for congratulation that it has not fallen into bad hands. The practice of the criminal law separates itself so completely from every other field of legal labor, that in the large cities it is rapidly falling into the hands of a separate class of lawyers, some of whom never appear in a civil case. The establishment of separate criminal courts in many of the large cities has had a further tendency to segregate the criminal lawyers from the rest of the profession. Such of those lawyers who have not access to complete libraries can furnish themselves with the current decisions on criminal law, of states other than their own, in no other way than through a series of this kind. We believe the time is not far distant when each of the leading departments of the law will have its separate series of reports; when, in other words, we shall have Criminal Reports, Bankruptcy Reports, Admiralty Reports, Commercial Reports, Equity Reports, Ecclesiastical and Divorce Cases, Land Cases and the like, in separate and concurrent series, embracing all courts. The law involves too vast an accumulation of knowledge for any one man to excel in all its branches, and the dictates of good sense and self-interest will soon lead each lawyer, at least in large cities, to confine himself to a particular department of his profession. When that time comes—when we shall have specialists in law, as we now have in medicine—every successful practitioner will be able to support a series of reports devoted to his own specialty. The criminal practice has so far become a specialty with a certain class of lawyers that this may be done now.

An attempt is made in this series to give, in about one volume per year, all the current decisions on the criminal law in the English and American courts. The editor promises that in future volumes no case which is deemed to be of the slightest importance will be omitted, that doubtful cases will be commented upon in notes, in which an endeavor will be made to treat the subject historically as well as theoretically, and that cases which are now established as leading cases, will, as occasion serves, be added in full in the notes.

Unless we greatly deceive ourselves, this undertaking cannot be carried out in one or two, or even three volumes a year. The present volume, although honestly printed, with large pages and without leading or stuffing, comprises, in 814 printed pages, but 98 reported cases. Mr. Green in his preface tells us that the number of volumes of reports published last year was 98. This would make an average of but one criminal case to each volume of reports. We believe from such an examination of the subject as we have been able to make, that the average will come nearer a dozen than one. There is such a diathesis of violent crime in some sections of the country, that we doubt if one volume per annum would do more than comprise the homicide cases alone. We recently had occasion to note ten homicide cases in a single volume of Alabama Reports. We therefore confidently think that Mr. Green must either resort to some principle of selection, or else he and his publishers must conclude to face the task of getting out several volumes per year.

We have not space to notice the many valuable cases comprised in this volume; but, glancing at the work of the editor, we find many scholarly notes of great value—which will be of equal delight to the student and profit to the practitioner. In these notes the learned editor does not limit his efforts to the collecting of decided points, but, in searching for the reasons and foundations of the rules under discussion, he carries us back through the old authors and through the most learned and instructive historical enquiries. This will appear from a portion of a note which we select at random, on p. 502, in which the editor traces the origin of the principle that a man's house is his castle. The following brief note, which we find on p. 295, will also show the discriminating cast of Mr. Green's mind:

"Many dicta are to be found in the reports to the effect that it is a well settled rule of the common law—'that in setting out a statutory offence it is generally sufficient to follow the words of the staute.' State v. Lockbaum, 38 Conn. 400, 402. There is no such rule of law. No distinction is made by the common law as respects the degree of particularity and precision essential to the description of an offence, between statutory and common law offences. All indictments must specify the criminal nature and degree of the offence, and the particular facts and circumstances which render the defendant guilty of that offence. If the statute sets out fully and precisely the necessary ingredients of the offence, then an indictment is generally sufficient which follows the words of the statute. But such indictment is good, not because it follows the words of the statute, but because it satisfies the common law rules of pleading. 1 Starkie on Crim. Plead. Ch. 12; Archb. Crim. Pl. 13th Ed. pp. 50, 51 and cases cited; Purcell's Plead. & Ev. pp. 79, 80, 81 and cases cited. In England by Stat. 7 Geo. 4, ch. 64, Sec. 21 (1826), it is enacted that 'when the offence charged has been created by any statute, or subjected to a greater degree of punishment, or excluded from the benefit of clergy by any statute, the indictment or information shall, after verdict, be held sufficient to warrant the punishment prescribed by the statute, if it describe the offence in the words of the statute.'

"This statute has probably not been generally re-enacted in this country. It is undoubtedly true as a matter of fact, that where a statute creates an offence, it is generally sufficient to follow the words of the statute. But this is true, not because there is any rule of law to that effect, but because when the legislature make a new offence they generally specify the facts necessary to constitute the offence."

The following note (p. 183) will also show the ready learning with which the editor illustrates interesting questions here and there, and by which he sets his readers to thinking:

"Coke says (3 Inst. p. 233), 'a pardon is a work of mercy, whereby the king either before attainder, sentence, or conviction, or after, forgiveth any crime, offence, punishment, execution, right, title, debtor, duty, temporal or ecclesiastical; all that is forfeited to the king by any attainder, etc., he may restore by his charter; but if by the attainder the blood be corrupted, that must be restored by authority of parliament.'

"Hobbes, who had a marvellous faculty for stripping words of their ambiguity, says in his dialogue between a philospher and a lawyer, while commenting upon the matter of pardon as treated by Coke:

"'P. * * * * Now tell me what it is which is said to be a pardon?'

"'L. What can it be, but only the offence? If a man hath done a murder, and be pardoned for the same, is it not the murder that is pardoned?'

"'P. Nay, by your favor, if a man be pardoned for murder or any other offence, it is the man that is pardoned; the murder still remains murder. But what is pardon?'

"'L. Pardon, as Sir Edward Coke says (3 Inst. p. 233), is derived of per and dono, and signifies thoroughly to remit.'

"'P. If the king remit the murder, and pardon not the man that did it, what does the remission serve for?'

"'L. You know well enough that when we say a murder or anything else is pardoned, all Englishmen understand thereby, that the punishment due to the offence is the thing remitted.'

"'P. But for our understanding of one another, you ought to have said so at first. * * * * '"

But Mr. Green might have done more in the way of notes and comments on his principal cases than he has done. Thus, in Bohannan v. Commonwealth, p. 613, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky criticises two preceding opinions of the same court, Phillips' case, 2 Duval, 328, and Carico's case, 7 Bush, 124. Had Mr. Green turned to these cases, he would have found an extraordinary doctrine announced and enforced by vigorous reasoning. The opinions of the court in these cases (or at least the more striking language contained in them) would have been worthy a place as a foot note to Bohannan's case. The case of Sylvus v. State, p. 679, on the burden and quantum of proof where self defence is urged in justification of homicide, afforded the editor an excellent opportunity to exercise, upon a point as to which the professional mind is unsettled, the fine discrimination which he elsewhere exhibits. The extraordinary doctrine laid down in Fields v. State, p. 635, should not have passed unchallenged, unless the editor thought (as we do) that it carries with it its own refutation.

But the efforts of an editor must end somewhere; and Mr. Green and his publishers are entitled to the thanks of the profession for what they have done in this first volume, and the profession is to be congratulated that the literature of the law is to be enriched by so valuable a series. We ought not to omit to add that, with the exception of the paper, which seems not quite as good as the publishers usually select, the mechanical execution of the book sustains their excellent reputation.

THE NEW YORK SUPREME COURT REPORTS. Cases Determined in the Supreme Court of New York, from November, 1873, to June, 1874. Edited by ISAAC GRANT THOMPSON and ROBLEY D. COOK. Volumes II and III. John D. Parsons, Jr., 1874.

We have heretofore taken occasion to express our gratification that the reporting of the decisions of the Supreme Courts of New York has at last fallen into good hands. We have likewise taken occasion to express regret that after Messrs. Thompson and Cook had begun this undertaking and begun it so well, the publication of the former "official" series, which had been suspended simultaneously with the suspension of the series of Barbour, had been resumed by another editor. The present series gave, and still gives, promise of so much usefulness that we thought it a misfortune to have the old anarchy resumed. So far as our means of judging extends, there is no series of reports now published, whose editors achieve what the profession require at their hands, more nearly than do the editors of this series.

In the first place these reports are prompt, following but two or three months behind the decisions reported. This, if there were no other excellence, would cover up a multitude of sins. In the second place, the work is well done—both editorial and mechanical. Of course we are not prepared to speak upon this point, as unqualifiedly as a practitioner would be who had for some time used these books; but from such a hasty examination as a reviewer can make, we are convinced that there are no reporters in this country who deserve more credit for careful and judicious work. In the third place, these volumes have a great deal of meat in them, if we may be permitted to use such an expression. Volume 2 contains one hundred and sixty-five reported cases—fifty per cent. more than ordinary volumes of reports; whilst volume 3 contains 273 cases, considerably more than twice as many as will usually be found in a volume of state or federal reports. With reference to the nature of these cases, they are what would be expected in decisions of the courts of a great commercial state. We notice a large—perhaps we may say an unusual number of cases—novel in their character and of general interest, and which do not rest in statutes peculiar to New York. We have selected a number of these, and hope to find space to notice them hereafter.

These reports, however, have one vital defect. They are decisions of courts not of final resort, and many of them are re-examined, and some of them reversed by the court of appeals. A "corrigenda" in each volume shows the disposition of the cases of the preceeding volumes which were appealed from, and in which a final judgment has been rendered. We shall not enter again into the propriety of reporting the decisions of courts which are not final. Suffice it to say that we believe that the commercial test is the only one which can be applied. If the profession want such reports, they ought to be published; and those who do not want them, need not buy them. The objection to the publishing of such reports is in our judgment the objection of the case lawyer, and not the objection of the lawyer who thinks.

THE PYSCHOLOGICAL AND MEDCIO-LEGAL JOURNAL. Conducted by WILLIAM A. HAMMOND, M. D., Professor of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the University of the City of New York, etc. Assisted by T. M. B. CROSS, M. D., Assistant to the Chair of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the same university. New York: F. W. Christern, 77 University Place. London: Williams & Norgate. Paris: Charles Rienwald & Co. Leipsig: L. A. Kittler. Monthly. $5.00 a year. Single numbers, 50c.

We have now received the fourth number of the new series of this valuable publication. It consits of papers on subjects connected with diseases of the mind and nervous system, read before various medical societies, mostly before New York Neurological Society. These papers are unquestionably of great value, and deserve the attention of every member of the legal profession whose investigations lead him into the domain of medical jurisprudence, and particularly into that department of it which relates to insanity. The treatment of the insane by our criminal law is but slowly emerging from the barbarism which treated madmen as possessed of the devil, and which prompted Rosalind to say to Orlando in "As You Like It," "Love is mere madness; and, I tell you, deserves as well a dark house and a whip, as madmen do." In our unscientific efforts to be humane, we have reached a point where the question of criminal accountability is tried before an ignorant jury, upon expert testimony, based upon hypothetical questions, and jumbled together with the general issue of guilty or not guilty. It has therefore become a scandal and reproach to the administration of justice, in which the legal profession must, in some measure, share, that the more atrocious and unnatural the crime, if it be one of a violent nature, the greater the impunity with which it may be committed. It belongs to the medical profession to enlighten the legal upon questions of this kind; and to this end, the dissemination of papers prepared by men of such eminent ability as those connected with this journal, cannot fail to be of great benefit.

Insanity as an Excuse for Crime.

SAVANNAH, GA., Oct. 3. 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In your number of the 24th of September, 1874, in noticing a review of Dr. Wharton's work on Criminal Law, you allude to a bill pending in the Ohio legislature which provides that where the defendant, in a criminal trial, pleads insanity, an issue upon that point is to be made up and tried by a special jury, in advance of the trial upon the indictment.

Such has been the law in Georgia for a number of years. I quote from section of the code, 4,299.

"Whenever the plea of insanity is filed, it shall be the duty of the court to cause the issue on that plea to be first tried by a special jury, and if found to be true, the court shall order the defendant to be delivered to the superintendent of the asylum, there to remain until discharged by the general assembly."

Two decisions have been made by the supreme court, touching this section of the code.

In Long v. The State of Ga. 38 Ga. 491, it is decided that the plea must allege that the prisoner is insane at the time of the trial.

In Anderson v. The State, 42 Ga. 9, it was decided that when this special plea was filed, but the defendant did not insist that there should first be a trial on it, but went to trial on the general issue of "not guilty," and relied on the insanity to show that he was not guilty, the jury might find him guilty or not guilty, under the evidence, without finding for or against the special plea.

From these two decisions it appears that the law is practically inoperative in this state; for, first, although the defendant was insane at the commission of the offence, yet if he is sane at the trial, the special plea cannot be filed; and, second, though the plea of insanity at the time of trial is filed, yet the defendant may go to trial on the general issue of not guilty, without a trial on the special plea of insanity.

If the defendant was insane at the commission of the offence, but sane at the trial, he must be acquitted. If he was sane at the commission of the offence, but insane at the trial, he must be sent to the asylum, if he should choose to go to trial on the special plea, but may be convicted if he should choose to go to trial on the general issue, as actually occurred in the Anderson case referred to in 42 Ga.

My own opinion is, that the question of insanity should never be allowed to come up in criminal trials. The violent and blood-thirsty members of society should be put out of the way of further outrage, without reference to the motive which induced them to disregard the rights of life and property. The laws of man should be administered in the same spirit as are administered the laws of nature. A short-sighted man, who has miscalculated his distance in attempting to swim a river, drowns, not because his motive is malignant, but because he has violated a law. Insanity, like blindness, or a "wicked and abandoned heart," is a defect of organization, and the highest triumph of human tribunals should be to minister to the survival of only the fittest. Very truly, etc.,

HENRY B. TOMPKINS.

Notes and Queries.

APPEAL FROM SATISFIED JUDGMENT—ANSWER TO B.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., OCT. 14, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.—Your correspondent "B," of Elko, Nevada, puts a case in your "Notes and Queries" of Oct. 8, on which he desires information. Permit me to say that just such a case has been passed on here, except that our case originated in a superior court of record, of general, civil and criminal jurisdiction. An appeal was taken to the supreme court (our highest court) by plaintiff, but pending the appeal, execution was issued on the judgment by the clerk, and was paid by defendant to the sheriff, while the execution was in his hands. The plaintiff did not order the execution issued, and instructed the sheriff to return the money to defendant; the sheriff tendered the money back to defendant, but he refused to take it, and the sheriff, by direction of defendant's attorney, returned the execution to the clerk's office, "satisfied." In the supreme court defendant moved to dismiss the appeal, because it was taken on a satisfied judgment.

After citing several Alabama decisions to the effect that plaintiff will not be permitted to prosecute his appeal further, if he has, of his own accord, coerced payment of the judgment, the supreme court say: "But the appellant (plaintiff) has done all that ought to be required in this case, by instructing the sheriff to return the money. The motion is therefore overruled."

I will add that we have no statute affecting the matter—the court exercised its inherent power. Respectfully,

R. D. RUGELEY.

REMARKS.—Will our correspondent be kind enough to give us the name of the above case, and the volume in which it is reported?

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Legal Gazette, for October 23, publishes the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Watts v. The McLean and Elk Land Improvement Company, in which the following interesting points are ruled:

1. The power of a corporation to contract, necessarily involves the cognate power to create debt, and the defendants having the power by their charter to dispose of the whole of their land, the minor power of mortgaging those lands, upon a proper occasion, belongs to them.

2. The company having power "to aid in the development of the minerals and other material" in and upon their lands, and "to promote the clearing and settlement of the country," the erection of saw mills and of a hotel were strictly within that power, and the directors cannot be held to account, as an abuse of their authority in erecting such buildings.

3. When an act done by directors of a corporation is in excess of their authority, yet has been done with the bona fide intention of benefiting the corporation, and a shareholder, knowing thereof, does not dissent within a reasonable time, his assent to the act will be assumed, and he will be estopped from gainsaying it.

4. When the act complained of is to be followed by a large expenditure of money, the shareholder should follow up his protest by active preventive means. His neglect to act at the proper time, bars his right of action as effectually as his neglect to protest.

It also publishes a decision of the Philadelphia Court of Quarter Sessions, Paxson, J., in the Matter of Opening Fifteenth Street, in which a jury, appointed to assess damages for the opening of streets through a cemetery, reported also an award in favor of the cemetery company for the cost of suitable enclosures upon the line of said streets. Upon exceptions, the report was sent back to the jury, with instructions to report upon the question of damages only. And this, notwithstanding the act of assembly, under which the streets were opened, directed that "in assessing damages for said opening, the cost of a" suitable enclosure of said cemetery ground, on said streets, shall be allowed.

It also publishes Chapin v. James, which we publish in this issue; and also the opinion of Mr. District Judge Knowles, in Chafee v. Coggshall, which we notice at the foot of the former case.

The Chicago Legal News, for October 17, publishes the opinion of Mr. Circuit Judge Drummond, in what are known as the Tuck Creaser Cases.

It also publishes an anonymous opinion of Mr. District Judge Deady of Oregon, on the subject of selling liquor to Indians, which has the following syllabus:

All Indians born and resident in Oregon, are, prima facie, members of some Oregon tribe, and are therefore under the charge of the superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, appointed in pursuance of the act of June 5, 1850 (9 Stat. 437), within the meaning of § 20 of the act of June 30, 1834. (4 Stat. 732), as amended by § 1 of the act of March 16, 1864. (15 Stat. 29).

Digitized by Google

An Indian born in Minnesota is, prima facie, not a member of an Oregon tribe, though he might become such by adoption.

The clause in § 6 of the act of February 17, 1873 (17 Stat. 463), providing for the abolishing of Indian superintendencies after June 30, did not of itself abolish such superintendency, but only took effect when and as the President designated and appointed.

The payment of a superintendent's salary until September 1, 1873, is prima facie evidence that his office was continued until that time, although he was notified that his office was one of those selected under the act to be abolished.

It also publishes a decision of the Supreme Court of South Carolina, by Willard, J., in Magwood v. The South Carolina Railroad and Bank, on the Transfer of Stocks held in Trust.

It also prints a decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois—Amick v. Young, by Breese, Ch. J., expounding the Illinois statute in regard to replevin, and stating under what circumstances the declarations of a party exercising acts of ownership over property, are competent evidence in a suit where the title to such property is in question.

The Legal News also prints the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, Scott, J., Walle v. Arnold, which arose under a somewhat novel state of facts. A deed of trust given to secure a debt authorized the sale to take place "at the north door of the court-house, in the county of Cook," etc. Before the maturity of the debt, the main body of the court-house, including the "north door," was destroyed in the great Chicago fire. A bill for injunction was brought, to restrain the sale, on the ground that the place where the sale was to be made was an element of the power, and, that being wanting, the whole power had become nugatory. The court thought differently, and affirmed a decree restraining the trustee from making the sale at the new court-house, but permiting him to make it "at the place midway in space between La Salle and Clark streets, where the north door of the old court-house was previous to the fire."

old court house having been destroyed, pursuant to the terms of said deed."

Mr. Justice Scott said: "It is not essential to the valid execution of the power given by the trust deed in this case that it should be executed in or at the 'north door' of the court-house as it was then constructed. Parties in making their contract must be presumed to have done so with reference to mutations that must necessarily take place in all structures, however permanently erected; that the old building occupied as a court-house was liable to be destroyed at any time and a new one erected. It would be absurd to hold the power could not rightfully be exercised at the "north door" of a new court house, had one been erected on the location of the one destroyed. The essential element in the power is the place rendered certain by the description given in the deed; and whether it is executed at the top or at the foot of the steps, or whether they have been destroyed and new ones erected, or whether there are none at all there, seems to us wholly immaterial. The mere fact that there has been a physical change in the buildings at the point designated, ought not to be held to destroy the power. This would be a narrow and illiberal construction which we are unwilling to adopt. While construing such powers strictly, they must have a reasonable construction given to them. Greater strictness out not to be required than the parties, by a fair construction of the provisions of the deed, contracted should be observed. Anything further savors of useless technicality. We entertain no doubt whatever that the power of sale contained in this trust deed can be well executed at the ruins of the north door of the old court house in the city of Chicago."

The same number of the Legal News also contains a brief decision of English Vice Chancellor Bacon, in Cox v. Bennett, where the court refused to discharge a person, who had been committed for contempt for marrying an infant ward of court, until the certificate of the due solemnization of the marriage had been produced, and a proper settlement of the wife's property had been approved.

The Chicago Legal News, for October 24, publishes the case of the U. T. Co. v. The Rockford, Rock Island, and Saint Louis Railroad Co., United States Circuit Court at Chicago, which involved a conflict of jurisdiction between the federal circuit court and the state court. The federal court, on the 20th of July, sustained a general demurrer to complainant's bill of complaint, and entered judgment dismissing the suit. On the 22d day of July, the complainant, Nickerson, filed his bill in the state court, and made his motion for a receiver on the 24th of July, which was of the same term at which the demurrer was sustained. The order dismissing the cause was set aside on motion of the complainant's solicitor, and leave to amend and file a supplemental bill given, and on the 25th of July, Nickerson, by consent of the defendant, obtained an order appointing receivers in the Henry County Circuit Court. Held, that the United States Court had not lost jurisdiction of the case when the suit in Henry county was commenced, and although the suit was technically dismissed, on the record, from the 20th to the 24th of July, yet it was all the time subject to the power of the court to set aside the order, and Nickerson could not, by commencing a suit in another county, supersede the jurisdiction of the United States Court over the subject-matter, and that the state court had no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver. The opinion was by Mr. Distrirct Judge Blodgett.

The Legal Intelligencer, for October 16, prints several interesting cases.

In Commonwealth v. Jones, the Philadelphia Court of Quarter Sessions (Paxson, J.,) holds that an attempt to vote illegally is, in Pennsylvania, an indictable offence.

The same court (Ludlow, J.,) holds that former paupers in the almshouse, who have been discharged as such, but who remain in that institution under contract of service for hire, are entitled to vote as residents of the precinct.

In Burrows v. Lehigh Zinc Company, United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania, Mr. Circuit Judge McKennan refuses to uphold Burrows' patent for a furnace to be used in the manufacture of white oxide of zinc, as he was not the first inventor.

In O'Mara and Irwin v. The Commonwealth, Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, the syllabus is as follows:

1. When the opinion of a juror as to the prisoner's guilt has not become a fixed belief, but is founded on rumors or reports which he feels conscious he can dismiss, and he is able to say that he can fairly try the prisoner on the evidence, free from such opinions or impressions, he is competent to serve as a juror.

2. It is competent for an expert to state a fact known to him as an expert, bearing upon other facts proved.

3. Evidence of what the defendant's wife said to him, and his reply, or want of reply, as a part of the res gestæ, is admissible.

4. Prima facie every unlawful killing is murder, for malice is presumed. But this presumption rises no higher than murder of the second degree; and the burden is on the commonwealth to show murder of the first degree.

5. The 9th section, article 5th, of the new constitution, was not intended to exclude the associate judges unlearned in the law, from the several courts named in that section, in those districts where these associates remain.

In Maxson & Wolfensden's Appeal, same court, A. agreed to sell realty to B., payments to be made in instalments, and deed on final payment; B. made the first payment, went into possession and mortgaged his interest to C.; who afterwards sold the same under a judgment on his mortgage and purchased it. In the meantime, A. had recovered in ejectment against B., for non-payment of instalments, the verdict or award to be released on payment within a certain time. B. failed to pay and surrendered possession to A. Held: that a bill filed by C. against A.'s vendees, to compel conveyance of the legal title on payment of the balance of instalments, must be dismissed, as being after the time limited for such payment.

Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the following cases, are reported at large in the Legal Gazette, for October 16, with full statements of the facts and arguments of counsel:

Insurance Co. v. Dunn: 1. Where, after a suit has been properly removed from a state court into the Circuit Court of the United States, under the act of March 2d, 1867, which allows such removal in certain cases specified by it, "at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit," the state court still goes on to adjudicate the case, against the resistance of the party who got the removal, such action on its part is a usurpation, and the fact that such a party has contested the suit in such state court, does not, after a judgment against him, on his bringing the proceedings here for reversal and direction to proceed no further, constitute a waiver on his part of the question of the jurisdiction of the state court to have tried the case.

2. The language above quoted—"at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit"—of the act of March 2d, 1867, is not of the same import as the language of the act of July 27th, 1866, on the same general subject—"at any time before the trial or final hearing." On the contrary, the word "final," in the first mentioned act, must be taken to apply to the word "trial," as well as to the word "hearing." Accordingly, although a removal was made after a trial on merits, a verdict, a motion for a new trial made and refused, and a judgment on the verdict, yet it having been so made in a state where by statute the party could still demand, as of right, a second trial, held, that such first trial was not a "final trial" within the meaning of the act of Congress; the party seeking to remove the case having demanded and having got leave to have a second trial under the said statute of the state.

The Lucille: 1. An appeal in admiralty from the district to the circuit court, in effect vacates the decree of the district court, and a new trial in all respects, and a new decree, are to be had in the circuit court. The latter must execute its own decree, and the district court has nothing more to do with the case.

2. An order of the circuit court merely affirming the decree of the district court, and nothing more, is not such a decree as the circuit court should render, and is not a final decree from which an appeal lies to this court.

Osborne v. United States: 1. A distiller's bond taken in pursuance of the act of July 20th, 1868, imposing taxes on distilled spirits, and which enacts "that a distiller shall, on filing with the assessor notice of intention to commence business, make a bond, with sureties, to be approved by the assessor, and that no bond of a distiller shall be approved unless he is the owner in fee, unincumbered, of the land on which the distillery is, or unless he files with the assessor, in connection with his notice, the written consent of the owner of the fee, and of any person having a lien thereon, that the premises may be used for the purpose of distilling spirits, subject to the provisions of law, and stipulating that the lien of the United States for taxes and penalties, shall have priority of such incumbrance, and that in case of the forfeiture of the distillery premises, the title of the same shall vest in the United States, discharged from such incumbrance," is not void, even as against sureties to the bond, because the ground was incumbered, and, because it being so, the bond was approved without the consent of the incumbrancers to postpone their liens; the bond not having been delivered as an escrow simply.

2. This is not altered by the fact that if the consent of the incumbrancers had been got to postpone their liens, the ground on which the distillery stood was of sufficient value to discharge the taxes due by the distiller, and so relieve the sureties from their personal obligations.

Morgan's Executor v. Gray: 1. Where a citizen of one state, as endorsee of inland bills, drawn or accepted by a citizen of another — the plaintiff claiming through the endorsement of the payee, or of the payee and subsequent endorsers—sues the drawer or acceptor, in the circuit court, the eleventh section of the judiciary act requires that the citizenship of such payee, or of such payee and subsequent endorsers, be alleged to be different from that of the defendant. It is not enough to allege that the plaintiff is a citizen of one state and the defendant of another.

2. It is not competent for a circuit court to determine, without the intervention of a jury, an issue of fact in the absence of the counsel of the party, and without any written agreement to waive a trial by jury.

Commissioners of Boise Co. v. Gorman. A writ of error granted under the act of Congress of 1872, will operate as a supersedeas only from the time of filling the bond in the clerk's office. Process issued before that time will not be set aside.

Hall v. Jordan: 1. Where the consideration in a deed is expressed to be so many dollars, the stamp required is the same, whether, in point of fact, the sum named be paid in gold or in notes of the United States, made by law a legal tender.

2. A party alleging that the stamp on a deed was too small (he being, by the law of the state where the deed was made, obliged to put on the stamps), who brought such a question here, delaying the judgment below for two years and a half, punished under the twenty-third rule, by a judgment of ten per cent. damages in addition to interest and cost.

It also publishes a case determined in the Court of Common Pleas of Columbia county, Pennsylvania—Locust Mountain Coal and Iron Company v Curran, in which the following points are ruled:

1. In a proceeding by bill in equity to restrain the collection of school taxes, the court will not enquire into the validity of the appointment of the collector, he having given bond with sureties approved as required by law.

2. The act of May 8th, 1854, did not establish a fixed rate of taxation for school purposes. It merely provided a standard, by which the maximum rate could be ascertained at the time the tax is levied; to-wit: the amount of both state and county taxes authorized by law.

3. The act of 23d of February, 1866, exempting real estate from the three mill tax for state purposes, operated as a reduction of a like amount on that species of property for school purposes.

The Washington Law Reporter, for September 20, publishes the following decisions of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in general term:

Joseph B. Stewart v. James G. Blaine: The house of representatives has power to commit for contempt, and when a party is found guilty of a contempt, the order of the house directing his commitment is a complete protection to the speaker, who orders him into the custody of the sergeant-at-arms.

Smith et al. v. Woodruff: Where two patents have been granted for articles which resemble each other, a presumption arises, from the action of the office, that there is such a difference between them that the use of one constitutes no infringement of the patent for the other.

If one paper-file holds the paper better than another which is patented, and has driven it out of market, that is prima facie evidence that the mechanism is different, and is a new invention, and that the use of it does not violate the patentee's monopoly.

A patented combination may be used without infringing the patent, if one of the elements of the combination is omitted, although another is substituted in its place, which is new, or performs a substantially different function, or if it was not known as a proper substitute when the patent issued.

Legal News and Notes.

—HON. ORANGE JACOBS, of Washington Territory, having received the republican nomination for delegate to Congress, has resigned as Chief Justice of the Territory, in order that there may be no mixing of the judiciary with politics. Judge Bedle, the democratic candidate for governor of New Jersey, has not resigned.

—THOMAS THURLOW, a nephew of Lord Thurlow, died in England last month, and the British public is relieved of its burdens to the extent of $60,000 a year. He received pensions to that amount in consideration of the abolition by law of certain obsolete offices formerly held by the chancellor, his uncle. By the statute abolishing the offices the emoluments were continued "for three lives."

—THE Union Pacific Railroad tax cases have been advanced on the docket of the United States Supreme Court, and set for argument, December 14. The granger railroad cases, the Grant Parish cases, and the case involving the constitutionality of the California State law forcing the return to China of Chinese women, brought there for purposes of prostitution, are likely, also, to be set for an early hearing.

QUÆRE.—Whether Lord Chancellor Thurlow was the same Lord Thurlow who once thought himself a poet, and on the leaf of one of whose volumes of effusions Byron wrote—

> "When Thurlow this d——d nonsense sent,
> (I hope I am not violent)
> Nor men nor gods knew what he meant."

If so, it teaches that a man may be a great judge and yet not a great poet.

—Considerable excitement has been created by the publication of an opinion by Attorney-General Field, of Louisiana, holding that the Second District Court of New Orleans has no jurisdiction to naturalize foreigners. The judges of election, themselves judicial officers, will, then, in determining this question, have to choose between the opinion of the second district court and the opinion of the attorney-general. We believe that they should, if otherwise in doubt, follow the opinion of the court, which is the best judge of its own jurisdiction.

HON. HENRY D. MAXWELL.—Intelligence has just reached us of the death on Saturday, the 3d instant, of the Hon. Henry D. Maxwell, of Easton, Penn., a lawyer widely known throughout New Jersey and Pennsylvania, having practiced in those states since 1833, and having in the latter held many offices of judicial and public trust, to the satisfaction and approval of men of all political parties.

Judge Maxwell was that rarest of men in these times, a man of political and social prominence, the holder of high office, and at the same time a model, Christian gentleman, sans peur et sans reproche. Upon his tombstone may most fittingly the epitaph be inscribed: "Exegi monumentum perennius aere." —[Albany Law Journal.

—THE Constitution of Missouri contains the curious provision that the justice of the supreme court having the shortest term to serve, shall preside. The object of the provision is, either that the oldest in commission shall preside, or else that none shall quit the bench without having taken his turn at that honor. But the provision has twice led to this curious and grotesque result: that a judge appointed to fill a short vacancy, and who is, in a measure, unfamiliar with the workings of the court, takes precedence over the entire bench. Thus, Judge Lewis, appointed the other day to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Judge Adams, and whose term will soon expire, becomes the central figure in the court, while on one side of him sits Judge Napton, venerable and white-haired, who occupied a seat on that bench thirty years ago, and who is now serving on it for the third time, and on the other side, Judge Wagner—a judge of great learning and vigor of intellect, who has been a member of the court for nine or ten consecutive years.

—AN adjourned meeting of the bar of the United States Supreme Court was held on the 15th inst., Judge Campbell presiding, and Mr. D. W. Middleton, clerk of the court, acting as secretary. A series of resolutions were adopted in testimony of their great affection and esteem for Judge Benjamin Robins Curtis, in life, and of their sense of the great loss which the Courts and the bar of the whole country, and the community at large, suffer in his death. They commemorate his fidelity to society, to government, to religion, and to truth. All these traits of duty, as the rule of his life, the bar present to the living lawyers, and to their succeeding generations, for their sincerest homage. The resolutions having been agreed to, Attorney-General Williams was requested to present them to the supreme court, and to move they be entered in its minutes, and the chairman of the meeting was requested to forward a copy of them to the family of the deceased. Reverdy Johnson and others pronounced eulogies.—[Albany Law Journal.

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

In the very interesting article on the Judiciary of Massachusetts, which we print in another column, our readers will recognize the pen of Hon. Francis Hilliard, the distinguished legal author, who favors this journal with occasional contributions. We have seldom had the pleasure of reading anything at once so well written and so full of interest, and hope it may prove of equal enjoyment to our readers.

LAW SCHOOLS.—We reprint elsewhere an article on this subject, from the Western Jurist. It will repay the reading by those who have taken an interest in the discussion which has been going on on this question. We are glad that we have succeeded in "refreshing" our excellent neighbor, and are sorry that our articles on the subject of admissions to the bar should be construed into "manifest hostility to law schools, unconsciously entertained and not intended to be expressed." Again we beg leave to define our position on this question: We are in favor of law schools, but are opposed to admitting young men to the bar who are not properly qualified for its duties.

LARCENY BY JOINT OWNER.—They have a statute in the province of Quebec, which provides that, if any joint owner steals or embezzles any money or other property, of which he is a joint owner, "he shall be liable to be dealt with, tried, convicted and punished as if he had not been, or were not, a member of such co-partnership, or one of such beneficial owners." Under this statute, it was held in the Court of Queen's Bench of Quebec, by Ramsay, J., that an indictment for larceny will not lie against a partner. The Court said: "To have had the effect sought to be given to it, the statute should have stated that the unlawful conversion of the partnership property should be deemed to be larceny. But if the act had been drawn in that form, it can hardly be supposed it would have passed. Such a law would destroy any tangible distinction between guilt and innocence, for partners are every hour of the day found unlawfully converting the partnership property, if their acts were strictly examined. The simple unlawful conversion of the property of another is not indictable, and it should not, in our opinion, be made indictable."

SUPERVISORS OF ELECTION APPOINTED BY U. S. CIRCUIT COURT.—A curious, but highly important function, that of appointing supervisors of elections in certain cases, is devolved upon the federal circuit judge, by section 2 of the amendatory act of Congress, "to enforce the right of citizens to vote." 16 Stat. 433. The provisions of this section are as follows:

That whenever in any city or town having upwards of 20,000 inhabitants, there shall be two citizens thereof who, prior, to any registration of voters for an election for representative or delegate in the Congress of the United States, or prior to any election at which a representative or delegate in Congress is to be voted for, shall make known in writing to the judge of the Circuit Court of the United States for the circuit wherein such town or circuit shall be their desire to have said registration or said election, or both, guarded and scrutinized, it shall be the duty of the said judge of the circuit court, within not less than ten days prior to said registration, if one there be, or if no registration be required, within not less than ten days prior to said election, to open the said circuit court at the most convenient point in said circuit. And the said court, when so opened by the said judge, shall proceed to appoint and commission, from day to day, and from time to time, and under the hand of the said circuit judge, and under the seal of said court, for each election district or voting precinct in each and every such city and town as shall, in the manner herein prescribed, have applied therefor, and to revoke, change or renew said appointments from time to time, two citizens, residents of said city or town, who shall be of different political parties, and able to read and write the English language, and who shall be known and designated as supervisors of election.

The duty of appointing election inspectors under this act was recently performed by Mr. Circuit Judge Woodruff. According to a New York paper, United States Commissioner Davenport handed in a list of names, some eleven hundred in all, for the confirmation of the court. One-half were named by the democratic party of the city, represented by Tammany Hall, and the other half by the republican party.

Mr. E. D. Gale was present in the interest of the Tammany organization.

All the names placed before the judge were confirmed, no objection being raised. Some ten or eleven others, which completed the list, were confirmed during the day.

Politics and the Bench.

Our able contemporary, the Western Jurist, after quoting from articles under the above caption, which have appeared in this journal and in the Albany Law Journal, (ante, pp. 435, 486), makes the following judicious observations:

We, too, have our views upon the subject, and confess to the entertaining of more radical notions than either of our contemporaries. We agree that the state should not be deprived of the services of its best men in its purely political offices, because these men may have occupied positions upon the bench. But, in our view, no man should ever be a candidate for a nomination to a political office while he holds a seat upon the bench. When he decides that he wants a nomination, or even consents that his friends may seek it for him, he should at once res gn. He has no right to sit upon the bench after he has become a seeker for political office.

A somewhat extended observation and experience, both at the bar and on the bench, has convinced us, that even in conscious integrity and the purest motives, the human judgment often reflects the bias of education, of association, and of party. It is not necessary that a judge shall be corrupt in order to decide according to his party preferences, or to vindicate the interests of his associates or friends. Human nature needs all the aids possible, and to avoid all the known hindrances to its best judgments,—even then its errors are quite too frequent. What peril of a fine would encompass a juror who was tardy in his appearance at court on the eve of an election, when it was known that his tardiness was caused by an electioneering effort in favor of the judge of the court whose authority he had contemned? Judicial discretion, under such circumstances, would equal the broadest mantle of charity. The fact is, that there is no political position in the land so favorable for the cultivation of personal popularity as in the nisi prius bench, and it can readily be converted, into what the bench should never be, a stepping-stone to political place.

There are three men from Iowa in the present Congress, who went there directly from the bench; and we have in the present canvass, three candidates for Congress who secured the nominations while on the bench, and two of them are remaining on the bench and dispensing justice during the canvass. In fairness to these men, personally, it ought to be said that they are among the best judges the state ever had, and one of the last named is confessedly the best district judge in the state; their integrity is above suspicion, and no man who knows them can for a moment doubt that they have and will administer the law and justice, as they see it, in perfect uprightness. For them we entertain the highest respect and confidence and sincerely desire their election.

But, in our view, their course in this respect is a mistaken one. It is an evil and a growing evil. The sooner it is corrected, the better.

With the foregoing views we substantially agree. We think, 1, That no judge should seek, work, or intrigue for a political nomination while on the bench. 2. If a judge is spontaneously nominated by a political convention, for a political office, there is nothing in the fact that he was on the bench when so nominated, which should, of itself, preclude him from accepting it; but when he does accept it, he ought to retire from the bench, or, at least, suspend the exercise of his judicial functions during the canvass, and allow his friends to do the electioneering.

Centralization—Uniformity—A National Commercial Code.

The Daily Register says:

There is a manifest tendency to centralization in law as well as in government. In law this tendency manifests itself in the advocacy of a unity of practice and forms of procedure. Let any one scan the history of jurisprudence in the several states, and he will notice an assimilation in the laws and in their interpretation clearly shown in all the states. If law is the embodiment of right and justice, it should be one and the same in the states and in the nation, for these two principles are immutable. In such of the states as have adopted Codes of Procedure, and thereby superseded the common law, there is a very striking resemblance in them all. It is probable that, one by one, the states will adopt this reform, and, by proper attention on the part of the legal profession, these codes can be assimilated each to the other, and one general system of practice made to prevail throughout the Union. This is a "consummation devoutly to be wished," because uniformity of procedure will do much to harmonize the present somewhat discordant elements of judicial opinion and practice of the courts.

We think the writer of the above makes a mistake when he designates the tendency to uniformity and homogeneousness, by the term centralization. Uniform codes of law voluntarily acquiesced in by local governments, do not necessarily imply centralization. Such uniformity only becomes centralization when it is enforced by a superior central power. There is, under the federal constitution, no central power which possesses jurisdiction to enforce this uniformity, unless it be with respect to commerce between the states. It is a question worth the attention of the bar of the country, whether Congress does not possess the power, under that clause of the constitution which delegates to it the regulation of interstate commerce, of establishing a uniform commercial code for the whole country. We do not believe that Congress ought to attempt the exercise of such power if its existence is doubtful; but at the same time, when we consider that commercial paper, emitted by private individuals and corporations plays a far greater part in facilitating the exchanges of the country than legal tender notes, it seems scarcely tolerable that such paper should be governed by one kind of law in New York, and by another in Missouri. And yet such is the case in one very essential particular at least. It was held in New York, that a person who has suffered himself, through the fraudulent representations of another, to sign a negotiable instrument, supposing it to be something else, cannot resist payment of such paper, when in the hands of an innocent holder for value. Chapman v. Rose, ante, p. 242. The contrary was held in Missouri in Briggs v. Ewart, 57 Mo. 245, a case which has met with universal dissent on the part of the profession, so far as we have heard any opinion expressed.

—CHARLES M. KELLAR, a prominent member of the New York bar, and one of the foremost patent lawyers in the country, died recently.

Something About Judges.

We have in our mind's eye two conspicuous examples of men who, without being members of the legal profession, exercised the functions of the judge, the one a soldier, the other a sailor. We shall not attempt to moralize on the lesson taught by these examples, further than to suggest that they teach that it is better that every man should stick to his own calling.

The first was no less a personage than the Emperor Julian, surnamed the Apostate, who often placed himself by the side of his Prætorian præfects on the seat of judgment. "The acute penetration of his mind," says Gibbon, "was agreeably occupied in detecting and defeating the chicanery of the advocates, who labored to disguise the truth of facts and to pervert the sense of the laws. He sometimes forgot the gravity of his station, asked indiscreet or unseasonable questions, and betrayed, by the loudness of his voice and the agitation of his body, the earnest vehemence with which he maintained his opinion against the judges, the advocates and their clients. But his knowledge of his own temper prompted him to encourage, and even to solicit, the reproof of his friends and ministers; and whenever they ventured to oppose the irregular sallies of his passions, the spectators could observe the shame, as well as the gratitude, of their monarch. The decrees of Julian were almost always founded on the principles of justice; and he had the firmness to resist the two most dangerous temptations which assault the tribunal of a sovereign under the specious forms of compassion and equity. He decided the merits of the cause without weighing the circumstances of the parties; and the poor, whom he wished to relieve, were condemned to satisfy the just demands of a noble and wealthy adversary. He carefully distinguished the judge from the legislator; and though he meditated a necessary reformation of the Roman jurisprudence, he pronounced sentence according to the strict and literal interpretation of those laws, which the magistrates were bound to execute, and the subjects to obey."

It must be confessed, if this account be correct, that Julian, notwithstanding his lack of judicial dignity, did very well as a judge; but he was a philosopher and an orator, as well as a soldier, and many of his compositions have come down to us as models of finished Greek and forcible Latin. As to the other example, that of the sailor, we shall leave our readers to judge whether he too was a philosopher.

An account of this hero we find in a late chapter of Governor Foote's "Reminiscences," which are being published in the Washington Chronicle. It was after the Louisiana purchase, and there was a dispute between our government and Spain, as to whether a portion of the present state of Louisiana, including the town of Baton Rouge, was included in the purchase, or whether it was a portion of Florida. At length the American inhabitants of this portion of territory, tired of the oppressions of the Spanish officials, rose up in insurrection, and without bloodshed overturned the Spanish authority and established a government "republican in form." The high court of judicature of the new empire, consisted of Fulwar Skipwith, a polished gentleman, who had been a consul of our government in France, and who is honorably mentioned in Mr. Jefferson's "Life and Correspondence," with whom were to be associated an unassuming farmer named Thomas, and a bluff and plucky old sea captain whose name is forgotten. The court was to meet for the first time in a log house, in which a platform of planks had been erected, and on it placed their chairs for the judges. Governor Foote says:

About the hour of nine o'clock in the morning, Fulwar Skipwith, dressed in the richest and most imposing vestments, which he had brought with him from the renowned French capital, made his appearance in the village of Baton Rouge, in a splendid coach, drawn by four magnificent horses, with a coachman dressed in full livery and a postillion to match. He drove up very grandly in sight of the crowd which the occasion had naturally drawn together. His carriage door being opened, he descended to earth, and strode with all the pomp of majesty within the humble tenement where he was expecting soon to act so important a part. He advanced to the platform, and after bowing with an air of gracious condescension to the staring multitude, took his seat and waited with absolute quietude for the coming of his official confreres. In a few moments the plain and unassuming farmer-justice displayed his person before the door of the court-house, seeming not to know exactly how to dispose of himself, when Mr. Skipwith, observing his embarrassment, beckoned to him most graciously to come forward, pointing him at the same time to the vacant seat nearest himself, as being the one which he was expected to occupy. Thus encouraged he advanced to the platform, and after cordially saluting his venerated associate, plumped into the chair which he had been bidden to honor. So soon as his confusion had passed away, and he had begun visibly to feel quite at home in his dignified position, Mr. Skipwith leaned forward, and in a sotto voce tone, thus addressed him: "Brother Thomas, I presume we can do little more to-day than organize the court and designate a chief justice. To-morrow we shall be able to address ourselves to our duties as the administrators of the justice of the land." After a little hesitation, Judge Thomas spoke out, quite audibly, but with the most marked deference: "Why, as to that, Mr. Skipwith, you will have, of course, to be chief justice, knowing, as you must do so well, how to perform the duties of the place." To this suggestion Mr. Skipwith responded: "I am decidedly of opinion, Brother Thomas, that the station of chief justice is one which ought neither to be sought nor declined. If my worthy brethren of the bench call me to this honor I shall certainly not refuse it." In a few minutes more the judicial triumvirate was complete, for the "Old Man of the Sea" made himself visible in the court-yard, clad in a naval uniform, which was now much the worse for wear, with a rusty sword hanging at his side, and with an impetuosity which brooked of no delay, rushed within the portals of this palace of justice, and, staring fiercely at Skipwith and Thomas—who, he evidently thought had done him wrong in ascending the platform before he should have arrived—pushed forward at once to the vacant chair and seated himself therein with an air and manner which clearly indicated the conviction that rested on his mind, that he was himself the very embodiment of the new government. So soon as the sensation caused by the arrival of so august a personage seemed to have a little subsided, Mr. Skipwith turned to his grim-looking associate, and repeated the words which he had previously uttered, in regard to the chief justiceship and the order of proceeding proper to be adopted; when up jumped this terrible son of Neptune, exclaiming: "Oh, as to the chief justiceship of this court, that's a question d—d easily settled. I am the chief justice of this court, by God!"

And this he is reported to have said, not without a significant glance at the sword which dangled from his belt. "Ah!" says Skipwith, "if you desire to be chief justice, be assured that no one here will dispute your claim to this dignity." Upon which, the new chief justice, glancing fiercely around the room, where by this time a large crowd had collected, called to the officer in charge of the jail, wherein several prisoners had been recently incarcerated, and demanded of him in tones that almost shook the building, what criminals he had in his keeping. This officer responded that there were several. "What are their offences?" asksd the rampant chief justice. "Why," responded the functionary, thus boisterously interrogated, "there is one fellow in for larceny, and another for murder." "Bring out the wretch charged with murder immediately," vociferated the chief justice. This mandate was obeyed quickly. Meanwhile this Jeffries of the new world, was "nursing his wrath to keep it warm," and preparing, as the English Jeffries was want to do, to chastise the alleged culprit with "the rough side of his tongue"—all the while looking eagerly toward the door for the appearance of his destined victim. The wretched man was presently dragged forward and brought within sight of the court. "Stop him there!" bawled the chief justice, when, rising from his seat and drawing up his person to its fullest altitude, which was about five-feet five inches, and projecting menacingly his rotund and "well-lined" paunch, he looked the trembling prisoner in the face, with a physiognomy that might well have reminded the admirers of Milton of his description of another much-dreaded personage, ("fierce as ten furies, terrible as hell"), and propounded this horrific interrogatory: "What have you to say why sentence of death should not be immediately pronounced against you?" "Why," with most overwhelming embarrassment the poor fellow, trembling from head to foot, answered, "may it please your honor, I have employed this here lawyer to defend me," pointing to a young and fine-looking gentleman seated in the court-house, and apparently watching the proceedings in progress with the most intense interest. "What!" exclaimed the chief justice, "you have employed a lawyer, have you?" Then putting on the whole armor of insult and menace, and glancing toward the barrister in question (who, of course, could not be any other person than our friend Judge Turner, in after years playing the part himself of a criminal judge in New Orleans), with that morbid suspiciousness of aspect so often exhibted of late in some of our courts in reference to the sagacious and erudite members of the legal profession, on the part of ignorant and presumptious persons, he thus addressed him: "Oh! by G—d! none of your quirks and quibbles of the law; if you are guilty, which I have damned good reason to believe, I'll be damned if you ever slip through these fingers!" holding both his red and chubby-looking hands aloft, and stamping with his right foot so potently as almost to break his way through the platform upon which he stood. After great effort, Mr. Turner succeeded in procuring a delay of five days before the trial should be brought on; and, in the meantime, news reached Baton Rouge that Mr. Madison had succeeded in his negotiatiou with the Spanish crown, and that what was so near becoming the sovereign state of Florida, would henceforward be a part of the United States of America, the inhabitants of which would never be again exposed to the insolence and oppression of the provincial agents of King Ferdinand, or those of any of his successors of true Bourbon blood and derivation.

Criminal Procedure—Sentences upon Information for Misdemeanor Containing Several Counts—Amendment of Record after Close of Term.

THE PEOPLE ex rel. MICHAEL MANYX v. GEORGE T. WHITSON, SHERIFF.

Supreme Court of Illinois, September 28, 1874.

Present, Hon. PINCKNEY H. WALKER, Chief Justice.

1. Criminal Procedure—Sentences upon Several Counts.—Where a prisoner was tried, upon an information containing one hundred and five counts, for selling liquor contrary to a statute, and was convicted upon forty counts, the verdict not specifying which counts, and was sentenced to ten days' imprisonment upon each count;—held, that the judgment was entire; that the several sentences of imprisonment were concurrent in point of time, and that when one had expired, all had expired.

2. ——. Power to Correct Judgment after Close of Term.—At common law, a court has no power, in a criminal case, to correct its judgment after the close of the term.

3. ——. Case Followed.—Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, stated and approved, and its doctrine applied to the present case.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Edgar Anderson, for relator; Edward P. Vail, state's attorney, contra.

Mr. Justice MCALLISTER delivered the opinion of the court.

The question for decision in this case arises upon habeas corpus awarded at a former day of this term, upon the petition of Michael Manyx, alleging that he was unlawfully imprisoned by the sheriff of Schuyler county, by virtue of a supposed final judgment or sentence of the county court of that county. In support of which allegation, various matters were set forth, and certified copies of the record of said court, so far as material to the questions raised, were attached to the petition and made a part thereof. By the return of the sheriff, which merely sets forth a copy of the judgment as the cause of the caption and detention of relator, and a stipulation between his counsel and the state's attorney, the record of proceedings in the county court is before us, with the same effect as if it had been sent up in return to a writ of certiorari accompanying that of habeas corpus. The case before us is this: At the March term, 1874, of the County Court of Schuyler County, the state's attorney, upon affidavits filed, and by leave of the court, filed an information against Manyx for alleged violations of the act, approved January 13, 1872, entitled "an act to provide against the evils resulting from the sale of intoxicating liquors," etc., the information containing more than one hundred counts. The case was tried upon a plea of not guilty, and a verdict returned of guilty, as charged in the complaint, upon forty counts. Whereupon, at that same term, as appears by the record, the court sentenced the prisoner to ten days imprisonment upon each count. On this judgment relator was, on the 26th day of March, 1874, committed to the county jail of that county, and there confined until the 26th day of June, when he was discharged upon a writ of habeas corpus, issued upon the prisoner's petition, by Chief Justice Walker, at chambers, on the ground that, by the terms of the sentence entered of record, the prisoner had undergone the punishment to which he was sentenced,—all of the terms having commenced and ended simultaneously. It is conceded by the state's attorney that there was no judgment entered for any fine or costs, and he does not question the propriety of the ruling of the chief justice in discharging the prisoner for the reason stated, and we may add, that although neither the county court nor this court have any right to review that decision, yet in our opinion, it was upon well settled legal principles entirely correct. That decision did not involve the question whether it was competent for the court to have entered consecutive judgments of so many days imprisonment on each count, when no particular counts of the one hundred and five contained in the information, were specified as comprising the forty on which he was found guilty, or whether consecutive judgments can be entered without a statute authorizing it. It was sufficient that, so far as appeared by the record, there was no attempt to enter consecutive judgments. The judgment was entire. The several sentences of imprisonment, if they could be called several, were concurrent in point of time, and when one had run, they had all expired. 1 Bish. Cr. Procedure, sec. 1129; Miller, Warden, etc. v. Allen, 11 Ind. 389; James v. Ward, 2 Met. (Ky.) 271; Buck v. The State, 1 Ohio State, 61.

After the prisoner was so discharged upon habeas corpus, and at the August term, 1874, of the county court, at the March term whereof he had been convicted and sentenced as above stated, said court, upon the petition of the state's attorney and ten days notice to prisoner, entered an order amending the judgment of the March term, and directing the same to be entered nunc pro tunc, to the effect, that defendant, Michael Manyx, be imprisoned in the county jail for the term of ten days, and fined in the sum of twenty dollars on each of the forty offences or counts of which the jury in their verdict found him guilty, the term of imprisonment on each subsequent count after the first to begin on the termination of the term of imprisonment on the one next preceding, and that he be imprisoned until said fine and costs of prosecution herein are paid; and, therefore, it is considered and ordered by the court that the people of the state of Illinois recover of the said defendant, Michael Manyx, the sum of twenty dollars fine for each of the several forty counts of the information of which the jury found him guilty, being in the aggregate the sum of eight hundred dollars, and also their costs herein, and may have execution therefor. Upon a certified copy of this last mentioned order of judgment, Manyx was re-arrested by the sheriff and committed to the county jail of Schuyler county; and which the sheriff, in his return to the writ of habeas corpus issued by this court, has set up as the cause of prisoner's caption and detention. If the entry, at the August term, of the order amending the judgment of the March term was a mere error which would subject it to reversal upon writ of error, then we have no authority to discharge upon habeas corpus. But if, on the other hand, the county court had no power or jurisdiction to make it, then it is absolutely void, and we not only have authority, but it is our duty to discharge the prisoner from that unjust, because unlawful, imprisonment. Amendments in criminal cases are entirely excepted out of the operation of the statute of amendments and jeofails, and the question of the power of the court to alter or amend its judgment, at a subsequent term, is therefore to be determined by the common law. The rule, as laid down by Starkie, in his work on criminal pleadings, is, that during the term, assizes or session, in which judgment is given, it remains in the breast of the court, and he states that the fine imposed, or any other discretionary punishment, may be varied, but he adds that after the term it becomes matter of record and admits of no alteration. 1 Stark. Cr. Pl. 262. Chitty says: "In case of misdemeanors, it is clear the court may vacate the judgment passed, before it becomes matter of record, and may mitigate, or pass another, even when the latter is more severe, and the justices at sessions have the same power during the sessions, because it is regarded as only one day; but they cannot do it at any subsequent period, unless an adjournment be entered on the roll, and no court can make any alteration when once the judgment is solemnly entered on the record." 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 721. So Archbold says: "A judgment pronounced by a court of oyer and terminer or jail delivery may be altered or amended by the judge at any time during the same assizes; a judgment by a court of quarter sessions may be altered at any time during the same sessions, and a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench at any time during the same term, provided the sentence be not actually entered of record." 1 Arch. Cr. Pr. & Pl. (Am. Ed.) 186. In the State v. Harrison, 10 Yerg. (Tenn. R.) 542, the court observed that the judge, during the term, is a living record, and, therefore, during that period of time he may alter and supply, from his own memory, any order, judgment and decree which has been pronounced, and this because, having made them himself, he is presumed to retain them in his recollection. But, at common law, after the term had elapsed, the judge had no such power, because it was supposed that there would be a period at which a judge would cease to retain in his memory the things which had been ordered and adjudged; and that period, it was well conceived, might be the end of the term, as he would be apt to dismiss from his thoughts the things which had been previously passing in them. It is, however, a very delicate power and might be subject to much abuse, especially in criminal cases, if the extent to which it might be carried was not well defined and properly checked by law. By analogy to this principle, it has been held that in criminal cases before a justice of the peace, the power of that magistrate is completely exhausted when the record of conviction has been made and signed, and final commitment made. The People v. Duffy, 5 Barb. 205; The People v. Brown, 23 Wend. 47.

In the recent and very interesting case, ex parte Lange, 18 Wallace, 163, the power of the court in criminal cases to alter its judgment after the prisoner has suffered part of the punishment under it, received a very exhaustive discussion in the Supreme Court of the United States. Lange had been indicted in the United States Circuit Court, under the act of Congress, for stealing, etc., certain mail bags belonging to the post-office department. Upon trial, he was found guilty, and the value of the bags appropriated was found to have been less than $25. In that case the punishment provided by the act is imprisonment for not more than one year, or a fine of not less than ten, nor more than two hundred dollars. The court sentenced the prisoner, upon the verdict, to one year's imprisonment and to pay a fine of two hundred dollars, on which he was committed to jail in execution of the sentence. The next day after his commitment he paid the fine to the clerk, who turned it over to the United States Treasurer. Some five days afterwards the prisoner was brought before the court, at the same term, and an order was entered vacating the former judgment, and the prisoner was again sentenced to imprisonment for one year from that date. Having been committed on this latter sentence, he applied to the supreme court for the writ of habeas corpus and certiorari, and return having been made of the proceedings in the circuit court, it was held that the second sentence was a nullity, on the ground that, while the first sentence was irregular, in that it included both imprisonment and fine, while the law affixed but one, still it was not void, and the prisoner having suffered part of the imprisonment and paid the fine which had gone into the treasury, and that being one of the punishments prescribed for the offence of which he was found guilty, the second sentence was in effect to punish the prisoner twice for the same offence, and prohibited by both the common law and bill of rights; that the second sentence was therefore void, and the prisoner entitled to be discharged.

That case is not so clear as the case at bar. There the court in the first sentence of Lange added to his punishment more than the law permitted. Fine and imprisonment were both imposed, when the statute required that it might be one or the other, but did not authorize both. In the case in hand, the statute required both fine and imprisonment and the court imposed only the latter. The people could not have sued out a writ of error for the omission to add the fine, and the error being in the prisoner's favor, he could not have taken advantage of it. So, that if the first sentence was not void in Lange's case, it certainly was not in the case at bar. The sentence being legal, and the prisoner having suffered the punishment according to the legal effect of that sentence, the second judgment was void according to the ruling of Lange's case, without reference to the question of the want of power to enter it at a subsequent term.

The state's attorney takes a very singular position. He says the clerk did not enter the sentence which the court pronounced, and therefore there was no judgment at the March term, and it was entirely competent, for that reason, to enter one at the subsequent August term, nunc pro tunc. That this is not the amendment of a judgment, but the entry of one, where there had been none before. This attempt to argue about a matter which admits of no argument necessarily, runs it into absurdity. The record of the proceedings in the cause shows that there was a verdict rendered, upon an information containing one hundred and five separate counts, of guilty upon forty counts without any specification of which counts they were. This was necessarily a verdict of acquittal upon sixty-five counts, but which ones they were, nobody can tell. It is a rule founded in good sense, that when there are numerous counts in an indictment, and the jury find the defendant guilty of some of the charges, and not guilty of others, it is necessary that they should point out with certainty upon what charges they find guilty and of what they acquit, and it would be error to sentence the prisoner upon counts other than those upon which he is found guilty. Woodford v. The State, 1 Ohio State R. 427. Here the prisoner was tried on an information containing one hundred and five distinct charges or counts. The jury return a verdict of guilty upon forty counts, without pointing out in any manner which they were, and the court and state's attorney fail to have the verdict corrected and made more specific. In that form it becomes a part of the record. Now, what judgment can the court pronounce? Upon what counts of the information will he give judgment? If he declared consecutive judgments, as the state's attorney says he did, where would he begin? Upon the first count? How did the court know but the prisoner was acquitted upon that? So it will readily be seen that the judgment which was entered of record by the clerk was the only safe and proper one which could have been entered upon that verdict. But however that may be, a judgment was in fact entered, that the prisoner be imprisoned ten days upon each count, the legal effect of which was, that the time began concurrently upon each. When the term elapsed, that entry became conclusive evidence of what the judgment was; and to say that the supposed judgment, entered at the subsequent term, which comprised forty consecutive sentences, is not an alteration of that former judgment, is sheer nonsense. If valid, it would be a serious alteration.

But the court had no power or jurisdiction at a subsequent term to make it. Hence it is void, and the prisoner must be discharged from imprisonment under it.

Partnership Real Estate—Rights of Creditors.

THOMAS B. MARRETT, ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY OF JOHN W. BAKER, SURVIVING PARTNER OF ATTERBURY, BAKER & CO., v. WILLIAM MURPHY AND JOHN GRACE, SHERIFF.

United States District Court, District of Minnesota, October 16, 1874.

Hon. RENSELLAER R. NELSON, District Judge.

Property purchased with partnership funds is treated in equity as the personalty of the partnership. It must, therefore, as against a judgment-creditor of one member of the firm, be first subject to the payment of the firm debts.

The bill of complaint in this case is filed by the assignee to determine which party to this suit has the right to the real estate mentioned therein standing of record in the name of Livingston, Atterburry and John W. Baker. The defendant, Murphy, claims the better right to the interest of Atterbury in the real estate, by virtue of two judgments and executions levied. The first judgment was rendered and docketed October 11, 1872, in the District Court of Ramsey connty, Minnesota, in a suit pending between Murphy and Livingston, Atterbury and Crawford Livingston, partners; the second was rendered in the supreme court of said state, August 18, 1873, and docketed in the Ramsey County District Court, August 20, 1873, in a suit pending between the same parties.

The sheriff had levied upon the interest of Atterbury in the real estate owned by Atterbury and Baker, and was proceeding to sell the same when an injunction was issued by this court.

The assignee claims that the property was purchased with partnership funds, by the firm of Atterbury, Baker & Co., as partnership property, and that Atterbury's interest is first subject to the debts of the creditors of the firm, before the individual creditors of Atterbury can assert their claims, whether they are in the nature of judgments or otherwise.

The undisputed facts show, that Baker, as surviving partner, was adjudicated bankrupt May 23, 1873; that Marret was appointed assignee June 10, 1873, and received the proper instrument of assignment, which included the real estate in controversy, mentioned in the schedules of the bankrupt as the property of the firm; also, that the firm of Atterbury, Baker & Co., commenced business in May, 1872, and continued until March 3, 1873, when Atterbury died, and that during the existence of the firm, the property in dispute was purchased, and the firm notes given for the purchase-price of a portion of it, which were taken up and paid at maturity or shortly after; that for two of the city lots payment was made by deducting the amount out of the contract price for certain materials furnished and work performed by the firm in the line of its business.

The deeds were executed to Livingston, Atterbury and John W. Baker. The firm is wholly insolvent.

E. C. Palmer, solicitor for complainant; J. V. D. Heard and H. J. Horn, contra.

NELSON, District Judge.—The rule in relation to the real property purchased with partnership funds, at least so far as the partners and their creditors are concerned, is pretty well settled. Equity treats such real estate, without reference to the situation of the record title, as the personalty of the partnership. The tenure real estate applied to partners, is that they become tenants in common, and each partner can only convey his own share, but the general current of authority, although there is some conflict, in equity, charges such real estate with the debts of the partnership. If there is a survivor, the share of the deceased partner in the surplus of the partnership real estate remaining after the payment of the partnership debts, and the adjustment of claims between the individual members of the firm, is considered as real estate only, in any controversy between the heirs at law and the personal representatives of the deceased. Story on Part. sec. 93, pp. 136-7, 3d ed; 2 Barbour, Ch. Rep. 165. The doctrine establishing, by an equitable fiction, partnership real estate as personalty, is in favor of trade and for the benefit of surviving partners and firm creditors.

I do not understand or so interpret the statutes of Minnesota that they change in any respect the equitable doctrine above stated.

The claim here is not a secret trust, or secret equitable right. If it exists at all, it is the result of the operation of law, and nothing in the statutes of this state defeats it.

I do not mean to assert that, as an abstract proposition, partners cannot with partnership funds purchase real estate, and hold it otherwise than as partnership property. If it was not the intention of the partners to so purchase and hold it, there can be no objection to a purchase, in good faith, for their individual account.

In this case, however, the testimony shows that it was the intention to hold it as partnership property. The surviving partner so states in his evidence, and has so returned it in the schedules. It must, therefore, as against this judgment creditor, be first subject to the payment of the firm debts.

Decree will be entered for the complainant.

DECREE FOR COMPLAINANT.

Limited Partnership—Contracts of Partners out of Scope of Business.

ELISHA TAYLOR, ASSIGNEE, v. AUGUST RASCH AND WILLIAM BERNART.

United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Michigan, October 19, 1874.

Hon. JOHN W. LONGYEAR, District Judge.

1. Limited Partnership—Notice.—All persons dealing with a limited partnership are chargeable with notice of the scope of the partnership business as specified in the articles of copartnership when the articles have been duly filed and published as required by law.

2. ——. Contracts by General Partners out of the Scope of the Partnership Business.—The same principle of law that protects a general partnership against liability upon contracts by individual partners out of the scope of the partnership business, protects the capital of special partners, in a limited partnership, against liability upon like contracts by general partners.

3. ——. ——. No departure by general partners, no matter how common or long continued, if not consented to or known and acquiesced in by the special partners, can have the effect to change or enlarge the scope of the partnership business as specified in the articles of copartnership.

In Equity. On pleadings and proofs.

When this case was before the court on a former occasion, on demurrer to the bill, it was held that a proper case for relief was made out by the bill. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants were granted leave to answer. 5 N. B. R. 309; 1 Am. L. T., 201. Thereupon the defendants answered and proofs have been taken.

The issues of law arising in the case as made by the bill, were disposed of by the decision of the court upon the demurrer. All that remains to be done, therefore, is to dispose of the issues made by the answer. They are as follows:

1. That the arrangement or agreement under which the furniture in question was purchased by defendants, was not as set up in the bill, but was made with "the firm of Tillman, Sillsbee & Company, by and through said William Tillman," and was of the tenor and effect, "that if the said defendants or either of them would purchase furniture of the said firm of Tillman, Sillsbee and Company, that then the said firm of Tillman, Silsbee & Company, or any of the members thereof, should purchase clothing of these defendants in payment of the same." 2. That the arrangement and agreement was within the scope and ordinary course of business of the firm.

Ashley Pond, for complainant; O. Kirchner and G. V. N. Lothrop, for defendants.

LONGYEAR, J.—The firm of Tillman, Sillsbee & Company was a limited partnership, and was composed of William Tillman and Charles E. Silsbee as general partners, and John S. Newberry as special partner. Whatever the proofs show as to the general partners being parties to the arrangement for exchange of patronage between them and the defendants, or as to what the particular character of that transaction was, one thing is certain, and that is, there is no proof or pretense that the special partner was in any way privy to the arrangement, or knew of it, or in any way assented to it. It is contended, however, that by the statutes of Michigan the general partners had authority to bind the firm. The statute referred to is as follows: "Section 3. The general partners only shall be authorized to transact business, to sign for the partnership and to bind the same." 1 Compiled Laws of 1871, page 520, sec. 1569. The effect of the statute is simply to exclude the special partner from active participation in the business of the firm; and as to the general partners, it confers no authority upon them to transact business, sign for the partnership, and to bind the same in any manner, or to any extent whatever, beyond the purposes and scope of the partnership. Therefore, conceding that the arrangement in question was made with the general partners, as claimed in the answer, if it was not within the scope and purposes of the partnership, it was wholly unauthorized and therefore void. This brings us to the second and only remaining issue made by the answer.

The scope and purposes of the partnership are specified in the articles to be as follows:

"Second—That the general nature of the business to be transacted by said partnership, is the purchase, sale and manufacture of all kinds and descriptions of furniture, chairs, upholstering, furnishing and upholstered goods, lumber, and all kinds of articles, merchandise, tools and machinery, used in such manufactures."

Surely it does not require argument to show that a contract for the purchase of clothing for the individual general partners, or otherwise, does not come within "the general nature of the business to be transacted by said partnership," as specified in the articles.

But it was contended that such had been the usual course of business of the firm, and proofs were adduced tending to show that such was the fact; and it was argued that, therefore, the defendants had a right to assume that the transaction was within the scope of the partnership. The articles of copartnership were duly filed and published, as required by the statute, and all persons dealing with the firm were bound to take notice of, and were chargeable with knowledge of their contents. No departure by the general partners, no matter how common or long continued, if not consented to or known and acquiesced in by the special partner, could have the effect to change or enlarge the scope of the business as specified in the articles. To hold the contrary would be to disregard plain provisions of law for the protection of special partners and the public, and would make a limited partnership one of extreme hazard to the special partner.

In the opinion of this court, overruling the demurrer to the bill (supra), it was shown that a general partnership could not be made liable upon a contract by an individual partner out of the scope of the partnership business. The same principle of law that protects general partners from liability in such cases, protects the capital of special partners in a limited partnership. Troubat on Limited Partnership, sec. 377.

It results that the complainant is entitled to a decree against the defendants for the balance of the account of Tillman, Sillsbee & Co., against them over and above the fifty dollars actually paid to the firm by one of its employees on account of defendants, together with interest on such balance from and after the date of the last item in the account, viz.; June 8, 1870, and for costs.

DECREE ACCORDINGLY.

Bankrupt Act—Discharge—Limitation as to Time.

In re BARRETT.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Texas, October 22, 1874.

Hon. AMOS MORRILL, District Judge.

Section 29 of the bankrupt act provides, that "if no assets have come into the hands of the assignee," the bankrupt may apply for his discharge "at any time after the expiration of sixty days, and within one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy." No power resides in the court to extend this limitation on account of sickness or other disability, and if the application be not made within the year, it cannot be entertained.

MORRILL, J.—The question for adjudication is whether the bankrupt, whose estate had no assets, is entitled to a discharge from his debts if he shall have neglected to apply for such discharge for more than one year from the time he was adjudged a bankrupt.

The first paragraph of section XXIX of the bankrupt act provides: "That at any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or * * * if no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, at any time after the expiration of sixty days, and within one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy, the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge from his debts."

The statute contemplates in this section two classes of bankrupts, the difference between them being the having and not having assets. To one class no limit is assigned as to the time the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy; to the other it is provided that "he may apply at any time after the expiration of sixty days, and within one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy."

It must be considered that, as the bankrupt act does, by its provisions and effects, impair the obligations of contracts, and would, on that account, be unconstitutional, if not expressly provided by the constitution, the construction to be given to this act must be strict; and certainly when the act expressly provides the way and manner, and within what periods of time a bankrupt may be discharged, the only question that can arise is, does the applicant come within the provisions?"

In this case the applicant seems to have realized the fact that he has not applied within the proper time, and has stated the causes and reasons for delay.

If the act authorized a judge to extend the time in consequence of the sickness or other disability of a party, there would be a different case presented from the one now before the court. As the case now stands, since the statute says that "the bankrupt may apply for a discharge after the expiration of sixty days and within one year," and does not authorize the application to be made at any other time, a court cannot consider an application made at any other time than as provided by the statute. The court can not extend, enlarge or contract the evident and express provisions, meaning and intent of the statute. The court has no more power to discharge an applicant who fails to comply with one provision of the act than another, or all others. The application is refused.

DISCHARGE REFUSED.

The Jurisprudence of Massachusetts.

A recent article in the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, concerning the late Chief Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts, suggests some fragmentary reminiscences of the court over which that distinguished magistrate presided, and the judges, who from time to time, have been connected with it. This is comparatively not a very wide field of enquiry; because the Supreme Court of Massachusetts enjoys the now enviable distinction of being a consitutional tribunal, not existing at the mercy of each annual legislature; and its judges have always held their offices for life. The consequence has been, not merely that they have, as a rule, been able lawyers, but also that they have been very few in number, when contrasted with the same class of officers in those states which are in the habit of abolishing their courts to humor the popular will, and, at longer or shorter intervals, of appointing or selecting their judicial officers.

Not long ago was published the one hundredth volume of Massachusetts Reports. It would almost seem as if the legislature, which recently restored the original system of numbering the volumes, had contemplated some special notice of the approaching centennial. After the seventeenth volume of Massachusetts Reports, so called, the series became broken up into the fragmentary collections known by the names of the successive reporters, Pickering, Metcalf, Cushing, Gray and Allen; deriving, no doubt, some accession of value and authority from the names of these eminently qualified individuals, but hardly enough to compensate for the accompanying loss of unity and sequence, and especially of that prestige which has indeed always attached to the jurisprudence of Massachusetts, and which cannot be fully accomplished without the express imprint upon each volume of its judicial law of that identical name.

In a notice like the present; number one of the one hundred, of course demands special attention. It is the Genesis of Massachusetts jurisprudence, and though doubtless deemed apocryphal by those who are prone to "ring in the new" in law as well as literature and life, upon examination does no discredit to the court or to the state of which it is the representative. Indeed, with reference to this and all the early volumes, the words of the primeval, sacred book may, without exaggeration, be quoted: "There were giants in those days." Francis Dana, chief justice, who appears only in the first volume, the son of a very distinguished lawyer, took a high rank among the eminent men of his day. He was in intimate communication with Washington. John Adams makes honorable mention of him as a leader among "the sons of liberty." He was a member of the first provincial Congress; sent on a private ante-revolutionary embassy; filled a variety of offices connected with the formation of the new governments, and, immediately before his appointment to the bench, was minister to Russia. But, for some reason or other, even during the short period for which he presided over the court, Chief Justice Dana seems to have been unaccountably reticent, his associates on the bench, Strong, Sedgwick, Sewall and Thacher, having in a majority of the cases delivered the opinion of the court. Many other names of the period, fully bear out the remark, that it was one abounding in distinguished men. Theophilus Parsons appears conspicuously at the bar in volume first, but early in the second is transferred per saltum to the chief justiceship. Among the "Examiners of Counsellors and Attornies" appointed by the court, March term, A. D. 1806, are the names of Parsons, Gore, Dexter, Otis, M. Sullivan, A. Jackson, Dane, Prescott, Putnam, Story, Ward, T. Bigelow, all men of mark, and most of them of national fame.

In looking over volume first of the reports, two criminal cases arrest our attention as decidedly sensational, sufficiently so to justify the payment of a liberal bounty to any newspaper runner of our own day, who might have been fleetest in the race to serve them up for a generation which loves to "sup full of horrors." John Battis, a negro, was indicted for the murder of Salome Talbot, a white girl aged thirteen; also for a rape upon the same girl. To both indictments he pleaded guilty, but was informed by the court of his rights, and of the legal consequences of such pleas, and remanded to prison that he might have opportunity to retract them. Being again set to the bar, he repeated the same pleas, upon which the court examined the officers and the committing magistrate as to his sanity, and "whether there had not been tampering with him by promises, persuasions, or hopes of pardon, if he would plead guilty." Nothing of the sort appearing, he was again remanded and the pleas recorded. On the last day of the term the prisoner received his sentence, "which the chief justice delivered in a solemn, affecting and impressive address to the prisoner." He was afterwards executed.

Five pages after this case comes that of Seth Braley, indicted for the murder of his wife. To the question "whether he was guilty or not guilty, the prisoner, in a voice scarcely audable, said, he did not know what to say—that it appeared to him she was still alive—it seemed to him he had seen her since." After repeated cautions from the court, he continued to make the same answer, firmly adding, "that he was guilty of what he had done, but did not know what he had done." Being remanded, on the next day "he said that he was guilty of all he had done he must confess." Upon these indications of insanity, confirmed by the circumstance that soon after the alleged murder, the prisoner had cut his own throat, the court immediately impanneled a jury, to try whether he neglected or refused to plead of his free will and malice, or by the act of God. The jury found the latter; "whereupon the prisoner was remanded (not to an insane asylum,—some progress in seventy years—but) to gaol."

Another noticeable case in volume first is that of Martin v. the Commonwealth, very elaborately argued and adjudged, in which the estate of a married woman was held not liable to confiscation under the absentee act.

With the close of the first volume terminates the judicial career of Chief Justice Dana, and the great seal of Massachusetts falls into the hands of Theophilus Parson. We have already applied the expressive, if hyperbolical, term giants to the lawyers of that period; and from the eulogy of Judge Parker it appears that this was the favorite designation of Chief Justice Parsons by his cotemporaries. That memoir, found at the close of volume 10, is perhaps rather less marked by discrimination, than by genuine and unqualified respect and admiration. But, making all allowances for the partiality of an official associate and a warm friend, such a tribute from such a source could not well have been paid to any other than a great and good man. In one respect particularly, it is confirmed, so far as all our recollections extend, by universal tradition: namely, that Judge Parsons, besides being a profound and learned lawyer, was equally remarkable for the extent and variety of his general information; an expert in classical literature, in science, and more than all, in everything pertaining to the common affairs of life. To this distinguished reputation his reported judgments hardly do justice. In the first place, they are comparatively few in number, and the merit of a judge, as of every other intellectual producer, must be tried by the compound test of number and quality. If it were possible to conceive that Shakspeare, with the central fire in his heart and brain which burst forth in Macbeth, should never have written anything else, miracle of genius as it is, he would not have attained the unapproachable pinnacle of fame which he actually occupies.

And so Lord Mansfield, Lord Eldon, Judge Story and Judge Shaw, not merely because they filled their respective offices so well, but also so long, are entitled to the first rank among English and American judges. During the entire period for which Judge Parsons presided over the court, the number of per curiam opinions, and of those given by the associate judges, is unusually large. Down to the 4th volume the seriatim practice prevailed, one feature of which is, that the chief justice is the last of three or four to speak, when it may well be supposed there is little left for him to say. One gets slightly weary of this rather unaccountable practice, and cannot help sometimes longing, in military phrase, for a counter-march, which will bring the commanding general to the head, where he belongs. In fact, where the judges are all agreed, especially if in premises and conclusions alike, the sometimes three or four times repeated "I fully agree with my Lord," found in the latest English reports, becomes superfluous and pretty costly verbiage. We learn from the biographical sketch of Judge Parker, that Judge Parsons for two years before his death, was prostrated by disease; and this may account for the greatly diminished number of opinions to which his name is attached in the later volumes of his chief justiceship. His judgments in important cases, as might be expected from the character of the man, are marked rather by clearness, precision, and sometimes logical or almost mathematical demolition of adverse arguments, than by great or profound learning. In this respect he very much resembles Chief Justice Marshall.

If elsewhere sometimes exaggerated, the following extract from Judge Parker's memoir of Judge Parsons is fully borne out by a careful examination of the reports: "He presented his propositions in regular and lucid order, drew his inferences with justness and precision, and enforced his arguments with a simplicity, yet fullness, which left nothing obscure or misunderstood. He seemed to have an intuitive perception of the cardinal points of a cause, upon which he poured out the whole treasures of his mind, while he rejected all minor facts and principles from his consideration. He was concise, energetic and resistless in his reasoning. The most complicated questions appeared in his hands the most easy of solution; and if there be such a thing as demonstration in argument, he, above all the men I know, had the power to produce it."

Brief as was Judge Parsons' term of office, his remarkable character and talent were of inestimable service in laying the foundations of Massachusetts' jurisprudence. For this great purpose mere legal learning was by no means the primary requsite. The English common and statute law was no doubt for the most part our law, and to understand it thoroughly was an indispensable qualification of a Massachusetts judge. But few pages of the early reports can be read, without finding illustrations of the fact, that immemorial usage, and early colonial and provincial statutes, had, upon a vast variety of subjects, almost created a law of our own. Judge Parsons was precisely the man to learn, appreciate and apply this local jurisprudence; and his happiest efforts are those in which, perhaps, by way of reply to learned arguments of counsel, founded upon the text of the English law, he adduces unanswerable enactments and precedents to disprove its binding authority in the State of Massachusetts. In such cases, we see the thoroughly practical man, conversant with all sorts of things, and familiar with all sorts of people; the man who, endowed by nature with extraordinary capacities which study and learning had indefinitely improved and developed, allowed none of the innumerable occasions to pass, when he was brought into contact with others, without making some important addition to his stock of available knowledge.

It may have been the result of these peculiar traits, that while Judge Parsons presided over the court, there were so few cases of divided opinion. Without assuming to reveal the secrets of judicial deliberation, it is not presumptuous to believe, that no single cause can contribute so strongly to unanimity among consulting judges, as the recognized oversight of one strong and commanding mind, ready to avail itself of argument and authority, but after all, often harmonizing or neutralizing mere technical precedent by the application of some simple and indisputable principle of common sense. It is certainly worthy of notice, that in one of the earliest volumes of the reports subsequent to the death of Judge Parsons, are contained many important cases, in which the court were divided. It had then come to consist of at least two eminent men—

Digitized by Google

Chief Justice Parker and Judge Jackson—who might be considered to represent two opposite phases of the judicial mind; the former, bordering, perhaps, on the latitudinarian, prone to construe away any technical rule which might stand in the way of substantial justice; the latter, one of the most exact, though at the same time finished and accomplished of American jurists.

It would be an unpardonable omission, in dismissing Chief Justice Parsons and his times, not briefly to mention another cotemporary sage of the law, to whom he himself sometimes alludes in terms of high respect and regard, as his valued counsellor and friend. Judge Trowbridge may be regarded as a somewhat mythical character. He flits across the stage of our early judicial annals, wearing "a kingly crown," indeed, but vanishing, like the phantom kings of the play, almost before we have time to bestow a glance upon him. His Reading on Mortgages is the only surviving memorial of his legal learning. Although a valuable composition, in its day, of a subject then imperfectly developed and understood, and very often cited with approval by eminent judges, it can hardly be now considered as a very complete or in all respects accurate statement of the law of mortgages.

The immediate successor of Chief Justice Parsons was Judge Sewall, for many preceding years a justice of the court, who, however, survived his predecessor but a very short time, both his appointment and his death being recorded in the 11th volume of the reports. In immediate connection with him may be mentioned Judge Demey father of the late Judge Demey, whose death succeeded his appointment in an equaliy short space of time, volume 11 recording the latter and volume 12 the former. Unlike his excellent and distinguished son, some of whose numerous opinions are among the most valuable to be found in the entire series of Massachusetts Reports, no recorded judgment perpetuates the memory of Judge Demey. To Chief Justice Sewall succeeded Judge Parker who had also been on the bench almost from the commencement of the reports. We are informed by the reporter, in announcing his appointment, that the office was tendered to Judge Thatcher, an older judge, but he declined it "propter invaliitudinem." Chief Justice Parker presided in the court for a longer period than any other man except his immediate successor, Judge Shaw. Judge Parker must no doubt be regarded as the chancellor of Massachusetts jurisprudence; entitled to all the praise and all the censure which may be involved in the application of that title to the judge of a common law court. If at times, to disturb ancient foundations and explain away well established but technical and sometimes obsolete and outlived rules, is more than balanced by infusing into jurisprudence the progressive spirit of a constantly improving age; then he deserves to be called a jurist of the highest order. And whatever opinion may be entertained upon this point, as specimens of rhetorical composition, of flowing and graceful language, often rising into eloquence where the case calls for sympathy or rebuke, Judge Parker's judgments have very few superiors in English or American Reports. In the case of Goodwin v. Hubbard, 15 Mass. 210, the law of which can hardly be said to have long survived its propounder, the chief justice says, "the question presented....is whether....the demandant can maintain his action for the land. If he can, we must submit to the humiliation of having a gross fraud and conspiracy successfully practiced, without being able to afford any relief.....But we apprehend that our laws do not merit such a reproach; and that by attention to certain general principles and rules, always recognized and respected as the basis of judicial decisions, justice may be done, the purity of the laws vindicated, and the purposes of this fraudulent combination defeated. He sometimes relieved the usual gravity and dullness of judicial opinions with a passing witticism. Thus in Peele v. the Suffolk Ins. Co., 7 Pick. 256, he says: "Indeed we cannot but think there has been a straining of the cause, as well as of the vessel, in order to charge the underwriter."

We propose only to glance at the judges who have successively sat upon the supreme bench of Massachusetts in later times. One of the most conspicuous, for the length of his term of office, and the good old age at which he died, was Judge Wilde. His first appearance is in the year 1815, in the 12th volume of Massachusetts Reports; his last in the year 1850 in the 6th volume of Cushing. He resigned November 5th, 1850. He was a man remarkable for simplicity of manner and character, of great learning, but without the slightest pretension or display. Some of his judgments, particularly in cases relating to real property, are among the best in the Reports. If he had any fault, it was that of sometimes, in a hasty reliance upon his own rare sagacity, propounding a rule of law, as indisputable, which is by no means borne out by the authorities. As where, in the case of Mason v. Thompson, 9 Pick 284, he holds an inn-holder to be, like a common carrier, the insurer of his guest's property; or where, in Lowell v. Boston, &c., 23 Pick. 31, he says of the now substantially overruled case of Bush v, Steinman that "this decision is fully supported by the authorities and by well established principles." Few judges have ever been more venerated and beloved than Samuel Sumner Wilde.

Another conspicuous judge was Marcus Morton who came upon the bench in the year 1825, and whose first opinion is found in the 3d volume of Pickering. Judge Morton, having been elected governor, resigned his office as judge in January, 1840. He too was a learned and able jurist, as abundantly appears from his recorded judgments; but his forte was at nisi prius, and more especially in his charges to the jury. In this department he probably never had a superior, if an equal, in the state. Samuel Hubbard is another conspicuous judge, although his term of office was comparatively short, and his opinions are few. He first appears in the year 1842, in the 3d volume of Metcalf, and died in 1847. No man ever saw through the intricacies of a complicated account more quickly or keenly than Judge Hubbard. His noble form and benignant countenance did no more than justice to the strength and kindness of the man. It is within the knowledge of the writer, that a youthful member of the bar, an entire stranger to judge Hubbard, happened to argue a cause before the full court, but during the argument Judge Hubbard was casually absent from the bench. He came in soon afterwards, and, seeing the counsel pass from the court-room into the library, the Judge stepped from the bench, followed him, expressed his regret at not hearing the cause argued, adding, "I understand it was very well argued," and then returned to his seat. That young man, if alive, is young no longer; but cannot have outlived the recollection of this simple, but most expressive act of judicial kindness.

In the year 1820, first appeared at the bar of Massachusetts, a man, whom not to single out for special mention would be a most glaring defect in any notice, however cursory, of the jurisprudence of that state. Daniel Webster stands as pre-eminent among lawyers and jurists as among publicists and statesmen. For that intellectual greatness which consists in the combination of powers and attainments, rarely found united to an extraordinary degree in the same individual, and in fact to some extent incompatible with each other, Mr. Webster never had his equal in this country, and perhaps few superiors in any other. Thus, he was a faultless writer. His style is almost a model of pure English; never wanting in force and vivacity, yet never running into rhetoric or exaggeration. It is needless to speak of him as an orator, for no one who ever heard him speak will question the proposition, that his eloquence was peculiar to himself; not merely superior in degree to that of any other man, but more differing in kind, and, until his head and face and eye and form, in fact until the whole man could be transferred to another, not approachable or imitable, so much was it the individuality of Daniel Webster. As a lawyer, in which light we would now more particularly look at him, it mattered not whether he was called upon to enchain or storm a jury, often perhaps to the overthrow of some strict rule of law, or the disregard of decided intimations from the bench; or whether, before the highest tribunal and most illustrious judges of the nation, he vindicated the constitutional sacredness of charter rights, or the right of a state to defend itself against treason, or the Christian faith as the vital spirit of all true charity;—in all these emergencies, Mr. Webster was perfect "master of the situation," and "what man dare do" he both dared and was able to accomplish.

In the 6th volume of Pickering, in the year 1827, we first find the name of Rufus Choate. Mr. Choate's earliest appearance before the profession and the community was rather like the flash of a meteor than the gradual rising of a star. We know of no term which better expresses the peculiarities of the man—physical, mental and moral—than electric. The only man to whom we ever likened him in personal appearance was Lord Byron, as seen in his professed likenesses. The resemblance may have been in part occasioned by the fact that the young lawyer, like the young poet, so arranged the dress about the throat, as to leave it comparatively open, thus greatly increasing the effect of his curved lip, flashing eye, and curling black hair; the tout ensemble being that of a poet, an orator, an artist, or whatever else might occur to the man or woman, for the first time meeting him; but, to each and all alike, a genius of the highest order, destined to make his mark upon the age, and such as only in a cycle of years lights upon this prosaic world.

Mr. Choate was indeed an extraordinary man; one who combined, almost without a parallel, in this or any other country, mental qualities the most diverse and opposite—genius and logic, poetry and philosophy, heart and head. Yet of all his traits we should select as the most striking, simplicity; simplicity of character and purpose; forgetfulness of self; an entire absence of personal ambition; appreciation of the true and the beautiful; consecration of all his splendid faculties to the performance of his duty. This it was more than anything else, which made him the idol of his friends and professional brethren, the charm of society, and the pride of the commonwealth.

In a cursory review of the Massachusetts Reports, no one can fail to be impressed with the constant recurrence of subjects of litigation, which have now wholly or partially disappeared from the jurisprudence of the state. Take, for example, the title of Militia, chiefly applicable to the periodical trainings and musters of the enrolled soldiery in time of peace. The quibbles, dodges and evasions resorted to, for the purpose of escaping a half day's inspection upon the public square, or march through the streets, were embodied in certioraris, the discussion and adjudication of which, in numberless cases, appealed to the concentrated wisdom and learning of the four or five assembled judges of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; the grand point at issue being the payment of a fine of two or five dollars. Another change, of far higher moral significance, is the comparative disappearance of law-suits connected with ministers, churches and parishes; often taking the form of actions brought by clergymen for their salaries, and defended upon grounds involving the most invidious personalities. The sale of intoxicating liquor, also, though still lingering, as a subject of litigation, even in the highest court, furnishes a somewhat diminished number of points for the consideration of the supreme court. Though not able to say with regard to all these topics, and others of similar character, "nous avous fait avec TOUT cela," yet the citizens of Massachusetts, justly proud, as they are, alike of their laws and of the magistrates who have construed and administered them, may well congratulate themselves, that somewhat higher issues have, to some extent, taken the place of those which assumed an inglorious prominence in years gone by. JUDGMENTS IN CRIMINAL CASES.—The important opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, which we elsewhere print—People ex rel. Manyx v. Whitson, has been delayed several weeks for want of space. For it we are under obligations to Edward P. Vail, Esq., state's attorney for Schuyler county, Illinois.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Chicago Legal News, for October 31, contains a very interesting decision of Mr. Circuit Judge Drummond, United States Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois, on the assignment of patents. The following is the syllabus, prepared by James L. High, Esq., of the Chicago bar:

1. Object of the Recording Act.—The object of the 11th section of the act of Congress of 1836, requiring assignments of interests in patents to be recorded within three months, being for the protection of bona fide purchasers, without notice of previous assignments, a conveyance of a patentee by a right under the patent, is valid, as between the parties, without being recorded.

2. Subsequent Assignment Operative on Residuary Interest.—Where a patentee conveys all his right, title, and interest in the patent in a particular territory, but has previously parted with some interest under the patent in a portion of the same territory, the second assignment will be held to operate only upon the residuary interest of the patentee, after having made the previous assignment, even though the first assignment be not recorded until after the second.

3. Construction of Second Conveyance.—Where the patentee has any remaining interest in the patent upon which a second assignment can be said fairly to operate, and the second assignment purports to convey only his existing interest, it will not be construed as showing an intention on the part of the assignor to convey what he had previously conveyed.

4. The Case Stated.—Complainants, in a bill to enjoin the infringement of a patent, and for an account, claim title under assignments from the patentee, executed in 1860, of the right under the patent for the counties of W. and H., in Illinois. Defendant claims under an assignment from the patentee, executed in 1870, of all his right, title and interest in the patent in certain territory, including Illinois, which assignment was first recorded. Held, that the first assignment is operative, though not recorded until after the second, and that a plea to the bill setting up the second assignment in bar of complainants' right of action should be overruled.

5. Recording Act of 1870 Construed.—The provisions of the 36th section of the act of Congress of 1870, with regard to the recording of assignments of patents, are substantially identical with those of the 11th section of the act of 1836, as construed by the courts.

Kennicott v, Supervisors of Wayne county, sounds familiarly, and we find that it is the same case which is reported in 16 Wallace, 452. It had been remanded to the court in which it had originated, and now the Legal News prints an opinion of Mr. Circuit Judge Drummond, finally disposing of it, we presume. The syllabns, prepared by Mr. Bissell, the official reporter, is as follows:

1. Letters Between Third Parties—engaged in negotiating the bonds, are not competent evidence to impeach them in the hand of parties claiming to be bona fide holders, unless they are shown to have had some connection with such letters.

2. Bonds Given for Goods.—The fact that bonds were received from the treasurer of the railroad company in payment of goods, is not of itself sufficient to bar the merchant from claiming as a bona fide holder, if the goods were of such a character as would be of value to the company in the construction or operation of the road.

3. Correcting of Mistakes.—Where a case has been to the supreme court, the circuit court, in passing upon a collateral branch of the case, will not allow that that court has made a mistake in regard to any facts which it has actually passed upon—the party moving to correct such mistake must go to the supreme court for relief.

4. Proofs Before Master.—Under an order requiring claimants upon bonds to appear before a master and prove their claims, a presentation of the bonds by an agent or attorney is sufficient, though the proofs were taken in another state, under the act of Congress, that is sufficient if no suspicion has been thrown upon the bona fides of the bonds.

5. Bona Fide Holder—Presumption.—Upon the presentation of a negotiable bond, the presumption of law is that the person presenting is a bona fide holder, until evidence is introduced tending to negative that presumption, he is under no obligation of proving himself a bona fide holder.

The Legal News publishes another ruling of Mr. District Judge Blodgett, in Re Scammon (ante, 328). The point involved is a matter of practice under § 39 of the bankrupt act as amended, and the learned judge rules that if it appears that the requisite number of creditors have not joined in the petition, the court will dismiss it on motion, without requiring the debtor to file a schedule; and that on such motion the court will hear affidavits and evidence offered by either party, and will order the person verifying the petition to be examined before the register.

And this reminds us of a mare's nest which we think we have found. When we published Re, Scammon, in our issue of July 2, we were in such anxiety to get it in that number that we took it from the Chicago Times, and forgot to give the proper credit. Two days afterwards, Re Scammon was published in the Chicago Legal News (Vol 6, p. 328), with the name of the official reporter of the court attached; and we were astonished to find in it a much longer and an entirely different opinion from the one we had published—no resemblance between them. We stammered out such an apology as we could, and directed our readers to the Legal News for a much fuller report of the case than our own. And now we are beginning to think we had better said nothing about it; for we find Re Scammon published in the National Bankrubt Register Reports, as we published it, and we find the Re Scammon of the Legal News published in those reports under the name of the Joliet Iron and Steel Co. There is evidently a mistake somewhere. Speaking of our scandalous conduct in failing to give the Chicago Times the proper credit in case of Scammon, calls to mind the following article on the subject of journalistic credit in this number of the Legal News:

"We take pleasure in saying that the American Law Times, in its digest of cases, gives the volume and page of the law periodical where the opinions are reported at length. This adds to the value of the Times, and should help to increase its circulation. The weekly legal periodicals owe it to themselves and to the profession to expose the monthlies and quarterlies that make up their digests of cases without stating where the opinions may be found. We will do our part in calling the attention of the profession to it."

We think our excellent neighbor overestimates the damage done by the monthlies and quarterlies. When the facts are rightly understood, the monthly and quarterly law journals will be obliged to limit themselves to publishing heavy articles, such as the weeklies cannot find space for, or else will be obliged to transform themselves into weeklies at heavy hazard to their publishers. We say when the facts are rightly understood, for we are satisfied, on a close examination, that the Chicago Legal News publishes annually four times as much valuable matter, by printers' measurement, at two dollars a year, as any monthly or quarterly publishes at five dollars a year. And then, when we come to consider the advantage of having legal news while it is news, instead of after it has become one or two or three months old, the difference is very striking. There is only one way in which the monthlies and quarterlies can compensate their readers for this enormous disproportion between them and the weeklies, and that is in the superior value of the matter which appears in their columns. And this compensation they but partially make; for they publish almost nothing in the way of novel and important judicial decisions that is not previously published in the weeklies. It is true the quarterlies publish valuable essays which would be beyond the limits of the space of a weekly. This, in our judgment, is the legitimate province of a quarterly law review. It ought to be composed of solid articles, written by the ablest men, on important questions of law and law reform, and reviews of law books, elaborate, thorough and impartial. When it undertakes to give a resume of the important decisions which have been reported in the twenty-five or thirty volumes since its last issue, it gets beyond its depth; and if its weekly contemporaries have done their duty, most of its news will be found old to its readers.

We think the Chicago Legal News will join us in certifying that there are but two or three journals, monthly or quarterly, that borrow matter from the weeklies without giving the proper credit.

The Chicago Legal News also publishes Re Frost, an interesting decision under the new bankrupt act, in which Mr. District Judge Blodgett holds, that in determining whether the requisite number of creditors have joined in a petition under the amendment of June 22, 1874, only those are to be counted whose debts are unconditionally provable—those claiming liens or holding security cannot be reckoned.

It also publishes a decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois—Mathes v. Dobschutz—with the following syllabus:

1. Rights of Party Putting Improvements on Minor's Land.—A father died leaving a widow and minor children. He devised certain real estate to his children. After his death his widow married again. This real estate was graded and a house built on it, which was claimed to have been done by the step-father and with his money. A creditor of the step-father sued him, obtained judgment, levied an execution on the land, had it sold, and filed a bill for the purpose of reaching the improvements made upon the lot, or the value of the property over and above the widow's dower and the value of the lot, had no improvements been made thereon. Held, upon no principle of equity could the bill be sustained.

2. The Term Real Estate.—That the term real estate embraces not only lands, but all improvements of a permanent character placed upon real estate, and such improvements are to be regarded as a part of the land.

3. Stranger Making Improvements.—That where a stranger constructs a building upon land of another without his consent, it becomes a part of the land, and he would become a tresspasser by removing it.

4. Consent.—That the owners of the fee were minors and could not consent.

5. The Step-Father and his Creditors.—That the owners of the lot did not, nor were they in law, capable of contracting with the step-father, and whatever money he may have invested in the lot was placed there at his own risk, and it can neither be reached by him or his creditors.

6. Sale Under the Execution.—That the purchaser of the lot at the sale under judgment against the step-father, acquired no title to the premises, for the reason that he had none to be sold or acquired.

It also publishes an interesting opinion of the same court, Craig, J., in Dinet v. People ex rel. Pfirshing, with the following syllabus:

1. Appeal—Waiver.—That if appellee desired to avail himself of the objection that no appeal would lie from the order committing appellant for contempt, he should have made a motion to dismiss the appeal; having failed to do so, he waived the right to insist on a dismissal of the appeal.

2. Contempt for Failure to Pay Moneyed Decree.—That it is not proper for a court of equity to imprison for contempt on a failure of party to pay a moneyed decree, unless the disobedience is wilful.

3. No Power to Imprison Appellant.—That if there has been a failure to pay according to the term of the decree, such failure was from an honest misconception of the true construction to be placed upon it, and not to an intent on the part of appellant to set at naught or bid defiance to the decree. Under these circumstances, the criminal court had no power to imprison appellant for the alleged failure to comply with the decree to pay the attorney's fees.

It also publishes McElroy v. Parker, Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois, Sibley, J. In this case the defendant sold to the plaintiff three hogs, and received five dollars on the purchase. He promised to deliver the hogs at White's scales, "on the 4th or 5th of March." He took the hogs on the 5th of March to White's scales, and remained there with them till two o'clock. The plaintiff not being there to receive them, he returned home. The plaintiff found the defendant on the evening of the fifth at his own home and demanded the hogs. Held, that the plaintiff could neither recover damages for a failure to deliver the hogs, or the three dollars paid on the contract.

The Albany Law Journal, for October 24, contains an article on Delivery of Bonds on Condition, in which it examines the following cases: Millet v. Parker, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 608; Lovett v. Adams, 3 Wend. 380; Bronson v. Noyes, 7 Wend. 188; People v. Bostwick, 32 N. Y. 445; King v. Smith, 2 Leigh (Va.) 157; Tindall v. Bright, Minor (Ala.), 103; State v. Peck, 53 Me. 184; Dair v. United States, 16 Wall. 1; Webb v. Baird, 27 Ind. 481; Pepper v. State, 22 Ind. 399; State v. Garton, 32 Ind. 1; Ward v. Churn, 18 Grat. (Va.) 801; Seeley v. People, 27 Ill. 173; Chamberlain v. Brewer, 3 Bush, (Ky.) 561; Decker v. Judson, 16 N. Y. 439.

It concludes as follows:

"The conclusions, which we think ourselves warranted in drawing from this hasty and imperfect review, and from some other cases which we have not had space to speak of, are the following:

"1. In the absence of all evidence of a conditional delivery by an obligor who has signed a bond, the presumption of law is that he has consented to the delivery to the obligee; and this is true, whether the bond is executed by all the persons named in it as obligors, or not; but this presumption may be rebutted.

"2. The mere faith on the part of the obligor signing the bond, and the assurance to him by others, that other persons, named or not named in the bond, are also to execute it, is not enough to release him in case this assurance is not fulfilled; there must at least be a delivery by him upon the express condition that the others also execute.

"3. If an obligor signs and delivers a bond to a stranger or a co-obligor, with the expressed oral conditions that others, whether named in the bond or not, are also to execute it, or upon any other condition, and the condition is not fulfilled, the bond is void, not only as to the obligor so signing and delivering, but also as to other obligors subsequently signing and delivering without condition; and in this state it makes no difference even if the delivery was to the obligee himself.

"4. If, in an action by the obligee, one of the several obligors is discharged from liability, for the reason that he delivered the bond upon a condition which has not been fulfilled, he is not liable in contribution to other obligors who have been held liable.

"As to the first and fourth of these propositions, we think there is no difference of opinion in adjudged cases. As to the second, we think it accords with the weight of authority, although we are aware of some cases holding, that if the bond passes into the obligee's hands unexecuted by some of the persons named in it as obligors, it may be avoided by obligors who executed on the faith and with the assurance that it should be executed by the others, even if not delivered strictly upon that condition. As to the third, we think it sustained by the preponderance of authority, and the better opinion; but its application in cases of delivery to the obligee himself, finds no countenance we think, outside of this state.

"As these questions are very important and abstruse, and the subject of variant opinions, we cordially invite the criticisms and suggestions of our readers upon them."

It concludes its very interesting article on the salaries of judges. It has a very useful letter from F. P. M., of Buffalo, on the Alteration of Notes, and contains its usual amount of other interesting matter.

The Albany Law Journal, for October 31, has an article by Theron G. Strong, under the caption, Can Actions at Law be Maintained between Husband and Wife? The following cases are examined: Freethy v. Freethy, 42 Barb. 641; Longendyke v. Longendyke, 44 Barb. 366; Adams v. Curtis, 4 Lans. 165; Whitney v. Whitney, 49 Barb. 319; Power v. Lester, 23 N. Y. 530; Strong v. Skinner, 4 Barb. 555; Dyett v. N. A. Coal Co., 20 Wend. 573; Minier v. Minier, 4 Lans. 421; Moore v. Moore, 47 N. Y. 467; Perkins v. Perkins, 62 Barb. 531; Wright v. Wright, 54 N. Y. 437; Dygert v. Reimerschneider, 32 N. Y. 429; Whitney v. Whitney, 49 Barb. 319; Diver v. Diver, 56 Penn.St. 109.

It also has an article on the Lateral and Subjacent Support of Lands, prepared by H. G. Wood, Esq., from the text of his forthcoming work on the Law of Nuisances. It also reprints the long address of Lord Moncrieff, read before the Legal Reform and Social Science Congress, September 30th. It publishes an important decision of the Supreme Court of California—Ex Parte Wall—rendered September 28, holding that the local option liquor law of that state is unconstitutional.

We wish we had space to publish a synopsis of the many excellent insurance cases reported in the Insurance Law Journal for October. We are obliged, however, to content ourselves with believing that every insurance lawyer takes this journal.

The Chicago Railway Review, for October 31, prints an interesting decision of a New Jersey chancery court— Mettler v. Eastern and Amboy R. R. Co. —of which the following is the syllabus:

The charter of a railroad company entitled them to take possession of land for the use of the road, when they could agree with the owners as to compensation, with a provision for arbitration and appeal to the courts. Arbitration was made, the report was set aside, and the issue tried in the Circuit Court, where the jury, under instructions from the judge, brought in a verdict for the damages, and found also specially the amount of interest from the time of the condemnation. The court reserved its judgment upon payment of the interest until next term. Meanwhile the company desired to proceed with the work, tendered the amount of damages without the interest, and took possession of the property; and the complainant filed his bill for an injunction. On motion to dissolve the injunction, Held, that the company was not entitled to possession until the amount to be paid was finally decided by the court, and payment made of the full sum. Yet, as the building of the road was a matter of public interest, the injunction would be dissolved if the company would pay into court a sum sufficient to cover the interests, costs, etc.

The Pacific Law Reporter publishes, without a syllabus, a very elaborate constitutional case decided in the Supreme Court of California, involving the construction of the provision of the constitution of that state, which prohibits the legislature from passing special acts creating corporations.

The Legal Intelligencer, for October 30, publishes De Witt's Appeal, Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in which A., the holder of a mortgage, obtained judgment on the accompanying bond, and assigned the judgment on the docket to B. Subsequently, A. satisfied the mortgage of record. There was a second mortgage on the same property, which, after the entry of satisfaction of the first mortgage, was assigned to C. Held, that C. took it subject to the first mortgage, as the assignment of the judgment was notice to him that A. had parted with her title, and had no authority to satisfy the mortgage.

Also Knoll v. Light, same court, which has the following syllabus:

Where parties owning property along a water-course, carelessly permit dirt, and other accumulations to obstruct the natural flow of water, and it shall overflow and damage the property of another, they are liable for damages.

But if the stream is obstructed by the growth of grass or other substances, over which they have no control, they are not liable.

One party may enter upon the lands of another and abate such a nuisance.

Also, Lovett v. Lovett, Bucks County Common Pleas, of which the following is the syllabus:

1. A lapsed legacy or devise usually falls into the residue and goes to the residuary legatee or devisee. If there be no residuary legatee or devisee, or if the lapse be of a part of the residue itself, then it passes as intestate property to the next of kin or heirs of the testator.

2. An executory devise may be limited to take effect after several intervening estates, either vested or contingent, if the final contingency upon which it is to vest, be not too remote; that is, it must happen, if at all, within a life or lives in being and a competent time afterwards.

3. The widow of a tenant in fee, which fee is determined by the death of the tenant without issue, is entitled to dower in the estate thus determined.

Also, Hughes v. Gallans, Schuylkill Common Pleas, with the following syllabus:

The contracts of an infant at common law cannot be enforced except for necessaries. When the infant represents himself of age, and thus obtains the credit, he becomes liable in an action on the case for damages.

Legal News and Notes.

—IT is reported that Germany has definitely proposed to the great powers the adoption of a general international maritime code.

—AMONG the recent appointments made by the President, is that of Wesley Ogden, to be collector of customs at Indianola, Texas. He was lately a judge of the supreme court of that state.

—CHIEF JUSTICE JAMES B. MCKEAN, of Utah Territory, who has caused such consternation among the Mormons recently, formerly resided at Saratoga, and once represented that district in Congress. He was a brigadier-general of volunteers.

—UPON a question submitted to the attorney-general, "whether the United States pension agent is prohibited by law from being connected with a government contract?" that officer, after reviewing the statutes applicable to the case, is of the opinion that there is nothing in the statutes applying in this respect to United States pension agents.

—COMMISSIONER BURDETTE, of the general land office, in his annual report, recommends a consolidation of the homestead and pre-emption law, and also that Congress give validity to homestead entries granted Indians who had abandoned tribal relation under a decision of Secretary Cox, but which was practically reversed by Secretary Delano. He also suggests amendments to the homestead laws so as to invest this class with full rights of participation in their benefits, upon their severance of the tribal relation as a step forward in their civilization.

—THERE is a prospect of some interesting railroad litigation in New Jersey. The other day, about forty passengers on the 1:45 P. M. Erie train, from New York, were obliged to stand about half the way to Paterson, and consequently several of them refused to give up their tickets to the conductor unless he furnished them with seats; after they had got seats they insisted that they should not be obliged to pay their fare for the time and distance during which they had no seats. The conductor refused to accede to this proposition, and ejected the resisting passengers near Passaic. Mr. Joseph C. Todd, president of the Todd & Rafferty Manufacturing Company, was one of this party, and he has brought suit against the railway for $10,000. Mr. L. C. Blanning, a Philadelphia jeweler, and two residents of Paterson, have also decided to sue the Erie Railroad Company for damages.

—A CURIOUS CASE.—Connecticut has a mystery at Bridgeport, that is attracting much attention in the New England states. A young man named Lattin is in jail at the above named place, charged with the crime of murdering Ellen Lucas, a young woman with whom he had held intimate relations. She was found dead in a marsh, with her face in the water, but the physicians and chemists have as yet been unable to account for her death. She was not drowned, for her lungs were still filled with air; there was no mark of violence upon her person, save what some believed to be the effect of pressure upon the nostrils; but there were no sure indications that she had been strangled. One theory was that she had been killed by quick poison, and color was given to the idea by the discovery of sundry concoctions, including prussic acid, in a barn to which Lattin had had access, and testimony to the effect that he had purchased certain poisonous drugs. But the chemists have been unable to find in the stomach any traces of poison. Then it was surmised that she might have been struck on the head with a sand-bag, and the body was taken up, the head opened, and the brain cut into thin slices, but no injury there could be discovered. In fact, the doctors have been unable to find any injury that could have caused her death. Her wrists only show that she had been roughly handled by some one. The coroner's jury have found that the unfortunate girl came to her death at the hands of Lattin, and he is held for trial, but with no conclusive, or really circumstantial, evidence against him. Altogether, the case is a mysterious one, and public opinion is strongly against the accused. —[Washington Chronicle.

ERRATA.—An important typographical error occurred in the article on Seduction, in our issue of October 30th. The last word of the 8th line, p. 539, should read "indispensable," instead of "indisputable." The latter word conveys an entirely incorrect idea,—one at variance with the whole tenor of the note. The allegation of service may, of course, be disputed.

BY a typographical error the name of Judge Dewey, in the article in our last week's issue on the Jurisprudence of Massachusetts, was spelled Demey.

Another error of less importance occurred in making up the last page of our paper last week. The printer inadvertently left out the article from the Western Jurist, on Law Schools, to which we called attention editorially, as being published "elsewhere." We now insert it "elsewhere" in this number.

Speaking of errors reminds us that our brother of the Washington Law Reporter has a proof-reader who is not infallible, and therefore he has been obliged, like ourselves, to publish a table of errata. In correcting some errors which occurred in Justice Olin's opinion in the celebrated soap-factory case —Bates v. District of Columbia—we find the following: "On page 263, 2d column, 2d paragraph, after the word 'knock,' read 'in the head.'" A very material amendment. The printer knocked that sentence so badly in the head that it hadn't any head left.

Compensation of Lawyers—Champerty.

The Albany Law Journal, for September 26, animadverts severely on Voorhees v. McCartney, 51 N. Y. 387, decided by the New York Commission of Appeals. This case holds, according to the syllabus, that an attorney, who brings an action in the name of another, in which he is beneficially interested by virtue of an agreement by which he is to have a portion of the recovery as compensation for his services, is liable, like the plaintiff, for the defendant's costs, and that his liability has not been affected by the provision of the New York code (§ 303) legalizing such agreements. This liability was created by statute, 2 R. S. 616, section 44, which enacts, that in an action brought in the name of another, by an assignee of a right of action, or a person beneficially interested in the recovery, such assignee or person is liable for costs the same as the plaintiff.

In the course of this article, the editor of the Albany Law Journal makes some observations on the policy of prohibiting champertous agreements between attorney and client, which are worthy of attention. He says:

> Now, the old statute was a part of a system under which lawyers were viewed and treated very much as malefactors. The legislature and the public seemed to regard them as a class of reprehensible persons, who were not to be paid for their services like other people. If they were permitted to work, it was mainly for the public benefit and behoof, like the convicts in our prisons. It was meritorious to restrict their compensation to a meagre pittance. It was even esteemed by many a venial offence to cheat a lawyer out of his pay. Agreements between attorney and client in respect to the subject-matter of the litigation, were always construed as frauds upon the client. The public were to be protected against these ravening wolves by legislation, and if the costs of a suit could be charged upon the lawyer, it was a joke that made godly persons laugh. But when common sense and the code came in, we tried to change all that. We left lawyers at liberty to make contracts for their compensation like other persons. It is notorious that an immense amount of legal business is now transacted in this state, by the most reputable lawyers, under agreements, precisely like that impliedly censured by the court in Voorhees v. McCartney, although seldom, we hope, entered into under the same circumstances. It is an affectation at this day to frown upon this mode of doing legal business. Indeed, some of our courts have held, that the existence of such an agreement between attorney and client, in a particular case, cannot be proved on the trial in defence, because it is immaterial and may tend to prejudice the plaintiff's case with the jury. Cook v. New York Central Railroad Co., 5 Lans. 501. We can see nothing immoral or impolitic in such arrangements, and we can see no reason for mulcting the attorney in costs because he has chosen to run his risks of getting any compensation for his services in the suit. We think the legislature would do well to look to this matter at their next session, if the case of Voorhees v. McCartney really decides what the reporter seems to think.
> The other decision is English. We refer to the action of the Benchers of the Middle Temple in expelling from their membership a barrister who stole some law books. We cite this case, not to condemn it, because we do not see how the benchers could have done otherwise, but to draw public attention to the facts which led to the commission of the crime. The simple truth was, this lawyer was starving for want of employment, and stole these books and sold them to buy bread for himself and another unfortunate in the same predicament. He was sent to prison for six months, and served out his term, and on his release his brethren who had expelled him from their fellowship, presented him with six hundred pounds sterling, and created a fund for the relief of poor barristers. But they could not give back to this unfortunate gentleman his honor. He was a victim to the ideas of professional compensation which prevail in England. A barrister may not solicit patronage; he must wait until an attorney brings it to him, and starve if it does not come. A lawyer cannot make an agreement that his compensation shall depend upon, be measured by, and be paid out of the recovery; that is champertous and immoral, and he must wait for responsible clients. Now is it not a little rediculous, not to say perfectly monstrous, that in the largest city and the most enlightened and wealthiest nation on the globe, a gentleman of education and culture, a member of the higher branch of the most influential of the learned professions, is reduced by fashion's caprice, and by the absurdity of the laws, to such an extremity, that he must starve, go to the alms-house, or steal? We applaud the humanity of our English brethren. We should have liked to contribute our mite to the fund for the relief of that most unfortunate lawyer. But we should like still better to be able to aid in bringing about a reform of their customs and their laws, so that a probability should exist that such a thing could never occur again.
> We hope our readers see the connection between these two cases. Legislation can never keep the relations between attorney and client pure. Lawyers and suitors must be left to deal with each other, like other persons of common sense and ordinary experience. Suitors will occasionally be fleeced by dishonest lawyers, but where one such case occurs, nineteen lawyers will be cheated by dishonest clients. There is a great deal too much of this sentimental nonsense in regard to the members of the learned professions. A physician must not advertise; a clergyman must not care for the amount of his salary; a lawyer must not have any pecuniary interest in the result of his client's cause. We had supposed that the sturdy sense of our profession, in this state at least, had weeded out this last idea. We knew it was legally extinct; we hoped it was morally defunct. But when a high judge stigmatizes the lawyers who accept retainers in the way to which we refer, as "speculators," and implies that they are "intolerable," we confess we fear the old folly is not quite dead. It is these ideas that lead to such tragedies as we have recorded in the case of the London barrister. They are "too good for human nature's daily food," at least for that portion of our profession who are still at the bar, and who expect from those of their number whom they elevate to the bench, and there maintain on comfortable salaries, the liberty to gain bread and not stones, fish and not serpents.

—HON. ROBERT A. HILL, Federal District Judge of Mississippi, has written a letter to one of the newspapers of that state, describing a trial of a negro boy, for an assault with intent to commit rape on a white girl, and congratulating the judge who tried the case, Hon. Orlando Davis, of the state circuit court, on the impartial manner in which the trial was conducted, and on the fact that a public example was made, such as would allay the public excitement incident to the commission of such an offence, and prevent public justice being vindicated by a mob.

Spies and Informers.

We have read with much interest a pamphlet entitled "Remarks made before the Committee of Ways and Means, in Advocacy of Changes in the Customs-revenue Laws, proposed by the merchants of New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore (reprinted from the 'minutes,' with additions), by Cephas Brainerd, of New York." That portion of this argument which will have chief interest to the reflective reader, is where Mr. Brainerd proceeds to show that the best writers who have adverted to the subject, have condemned both the justice and the expediency of employing informers in the enforcement of penal laws. We cannot refrain from quoting the language in which he presents the views of several eminent writers:

"Lord Auckland declared himself most emphatically against it in his remarkable treatise. He says (Eden's Principles of Penal Law, 2d Ed., p. 322):

'The first step towards the punishment of offenders is their formal accusation. In all governments which have any mixture of political freedom, this accusation should, as in England, be public. Private informers are the proper instruments only of despotic governments. Every idea of liberty and security is lost, where the ends of justice are suffered to be sought by such means.'

"So, too, Bentham, who gives this reason for his condemnation (On Rewards, p. 161):

The danger lies in the temptation given to such officers to increase their emoluments by increasing the difficulties of those who need their services. The abuse is easily introduced.

"So Colquhoun, writing, out of the fullness of his wide experience as a London magistrate, says:

Many excellent rules are established by the legislature and the magistrates; but while it is seldom the interest of the depraved or dishonest part of these two classes to adhere to such rules, by what means is the execution to be insured, so as to operate as a complete protection to the public? Surely not by the operation of the law through the medium of common informers. Since, independent of the invidious nature of the office, experience has shown that the public good rarely enters into the considerations of persons of this description, who look merely to their own emolument, frequently holding up the penalties as a rod by which money is privately extorted, and the parties laid under contribution for the purpose of allowing them to continue in the practice of these abuses, which the engine used for this nefarious purpose was meant to prevent. Treatise on the Police of London, 1796, p. 191.

"And again (id., pp. 203–204) the same eminent author, after giving a schedule of the rewards offered for the detection and conviction of offenders, says:

These rewards apply to ten different offences, and ought, no doubt, to be a considerable spur to officers to do their duty; but it seems as if there is some radical error in the system. Since, however atrocious most of these offences are which have been selected at different periods by the legislature as objects of reward, it is extremely doubtful whether this measure has not, in some degree, tended to the increase of a multitude of smaller crimes which are pregnant with the greatest mischiefs to society. It is by deterring men from the commission of smaller crimes (says the Marquis Beccaria) that greater ones are prevented. * * * * * * * *

While rewards are limited to higher offences, and conviction is the indispensable condition upon which they are granted, it is much to be feared that lesser crimes are overlooked, and the public subjected, in many instances, to the intermediate depredations of a rogue, from his first starting upon the town until he shall be worth £40.

"Colquhoun, in the latest (6th) edition of his famous book, retains the condemnatory language just quoted, and adds the following suggestion as a substitute for the system paralleled by that we here assail (The Police of the Metropolis, p. 393):

By altering the system entirely, and leaving it in the hands of the judge who tries the offence, to determine what reward shall be allowed, with a power to grant or withold, or limit or increase the same according to circumstances connected with the trouble and risk of the parties, whether there is a conviction or not, a fairer measure of recompense would be dealt out, the public money would be more beneficially distributed, so as to excite general activity in checking every species of criminality.

"Beccaria expresses his conclusion as a philosopher, and his indignation as a man, in regard to the system of informers and rewards, in principle like that we now seek to overthrow, in these burning but truthful words (Essay on Crimes, Ch. 36; Ed. of 1767, p. 151):

At one time treachery is punished by the laws, at another encouraged. With one hand the legislator strengthens the ties of kindred and friendship, and with the other, rewards the violation of both. Always in contradiction with himself, now he invites the suspecting minds of men to mutual confidence, and now he plants distrust in every heart. To prevent one crime he gives birth to a thousand. Such are the expedients of weak nations, whose laws are like temporary repairs to a tottering fabric.

"Frederick Hill is the great modern English authority on this branch of penal science. He states the results of the best experience and thought to a very recent date, in the following extract (Vide, Crime: Its Amount, Causes and Remedies, 1853, p. 134–135):

But not only is the police in some places almost a nullity, and in others insufficient in number and too much separated in different parts, but the mode of remuneration, though improved, is still faulty, awaiting no doubt a further progress in public opinion. It is still too much directed to detection, and too little to prevention, thus reserving high rewards till great offences have been committed, instead of making all rewards simply dependent on the small amount of crime. So long as the police receive large premiums for the apprehension of great criminals, it is continually their interest (although many of them are no doubt too honorable to be so swayed) that great criminals should exist; their motive for the extinction of such offenders being scarcely greater than that of a poacher for the extinction of hares and pheasants, and great as is this objection to the practice of offering large rewards, it is not the greatest: for the terrible cases of "blood money" that have sometimes come to light, show that official villains have been found, under the stimulus of these rewards, to get up evidence against persons who were wholly innocent.

By way of climax to the effect produced by these quotations, Mr. Brainerd eloquently adds: "Was Dean Swift wrong when he said, 'informers are a detestable race of people'? Did Wilberforce—statesman as he was—surrender his temperate, gentle and charitable nature when he said that the practice of employing spies and informers 'was as injurious to the best interests of the country and the constitution as it was repugnant to every principle of morality and religion': Had the equable and humane spirit which characterized the whole life of Sir Samuel Romilly for once abandoned this unrivaled legislator when, while declining to say 'whether there may or may not possibly exist cases in which private treachery may be encouraged for the sake of discovering public guilt,' he desired to diminish the employment of spies and informers, for the purpose of removing 'a plague from the bosoms of the peaceful and well disposed inhabitants,' * * * 'and as an agreeable service to the God of truth'? Vide Romilly's Speeches, vol 2. pp. 307–309. Are the merchants who appear here, making a request, which is meekness itself when compared with these expressions, fitly characterized, as they have been by the special agent, as 'infernal thieves, and their representatives'? I think not."

To our mind the vital objection to the system of informers may be stated in a few words: The truth never injures an honest man. It is his shield—his tutissimum refugium. The more it is told concerning him, the brighter he shines in the estimation of honest men. It is only dishonest men who deal in falsehood and love darkness and mystery. If, therefore, informers told only the truth, the cry against them would come from the dishonest alone; and it is not to shield the dishonest that penal laws are instituted. But, unfortunately, informers do not always tell the truth; but on the other hand, there is too much reason to believe that, under the stimulus of the prospective rewards which constitute their incentive to exertion, they habitually pervert the truth, and act corruptly and oppressively. In illustrating his position, Mr. Brainerd has, as above shown, quoted from several writers familiar with the workings of the system in the British Empire. We are tempted to illustrate ours by another quotation, showing how the system worked in that great fabric of civilization on which have been reared the present states of Europe. It is thus stated by Gibbon, in describing the condition of the Roman Empire at the time of Constantine:

Two or three hundred agents or messengers were employed under the jurisdiction of the master of the offices, to announce the names of the annual consuls, and the edicts or victories of the emperors. They insensibly assumed the license of reporting whatever they could observe of the conduct either of magistrates or of private citizens; and were soon considered as the eyes of the monarch and the scourge of the people. Under the warm influence of a feeble reign, they multiplied to the incredible number of ten thousand, disdained the mild though frequent admonitions of the laws, and exercised in the profitable management of the posts, a rapacious and insolent oppression. These official spies, who regularly corresponded with the palace, were encouraged, by favor and reward, anxiously to watch the progress of every treasonable design, from the faint and latent symptoms of a disaffection, to the actual preparation of an open revolt. Their careless and criminal violation of truth and justice was covered by the consecrated mask of zeal; and they might securely aim their poisoned arrows at the breast, either of the guilty or the innocent, who had provoked their resentment, or refused to purchase their silence. A faithful subject of Syria, perhaps, or of Britain, was exposed to the danger, or at least to the dread, of being dragged in chains to the court of Milan or of Constantinople, to defend his life and fortune against the malicious charges of these privileged informers. The ordinary administration was conducted by those methods which extreme necessity can alone palliate; and the defects of evidence were diligently supplied by the use of torture.

Bankrupt Act—Number and Value of Creditors.

Most of the questions which, so far, appear to have arisen under the amendments of June 22, 1874, to the bankrupt act, relate to the number of petitioning creditors, and the proportion of the total indebtedness of the alleged bankrupt, represented by them, in compulsory cases. Most of these decisions are decisions of district judges, and are hence without authority outside the district in which they were rendered; but, nevertheless, by collecting and presenting, as we shall endeavor to do in this note, a brief synopsis of them, some little assistance may be rendered toward making the administration of the bankrupt law "uniform" "throughout the United States."

Section 39 of the bankrupt act, as amended by § 12 of the act of June 22, 1874, contains the following language: "And in all cases commenced since the first day of December, eighteen hundred and seventy-three, and prior to the passage of this act, as well as those commenced hereafter, the court shall, if such allegation as to the number or amount of petitioning creditors be denied by the debtor, by a statement in writing to that effect, require him to file in court, forthwith, a full list of his creditors, with their places of residence, and the sums due them respectively, and shall ascertain, upon reasonable notice to the creditors, whether one-fourth in number and one-third in amount thereof, as aforesaid, have petitioned that the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt. But if such debtor shall, on the filing of the petition, admit in writing that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned, the court (if satisfied that the admission was made in good faith) shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final, and the matter proceed without further steps on that subject. And if it shall appear that such number and amount have not so petitioned, the court shall grant reasonable time, not exceeding, in cases heretofore commenced, twenty days, and, in cases hereafter commenced, ten days, within which other creditors may join in such petition. And if, at the expiration of such time so limited, the number and amount shall comply with the requirements of this section, the matter of bankruptcy may proceed; but if, at the expiration of such limited time, such number and amount shall not answer the requirements of this section, the proceedings shall be dismissed, and, in cases hereafter commenced, with costs."

It has been held that this provision applies to all cases commenced since December 1, 1873, in which at the time of the passage of this amendment (June 22, 1874), the petitions for adjudication remained to be acted upon, but it does not disturb judgments rendered or adjudications in force prior to the date of its taking effect. Re Obear and Re Thomas, 1 Central Law Journal, 362, Dillon, J.; s. c., 10 N. B. R. 153; Re Angell, 1 Central Law Journal, 363, Longyear, J.; s. c., 6 Chicago Legal News, 341; 10, N. B. R., 73; Re Raffauf, 6 Chicago Legal News, 341, Hopkins J.; s. c., 10 N. B. B. R. 208, Withey, J.; Barnett v. Hightower, 10 N. B. R 157, Hill, J.; Re Comstock, 6 Chicago Legal News, 413, Deady, J. Some of these cases go so far as to assert that it would have been beyond the power of congress to pass an act which should have the effect to disturb adjudications already made. Re Comstock, supra; Re Angell, supra; Re Raffauf, supra; Re Pickering, supra.

Before any of these decisions had been published, it was held by Mr. District Judge Blodgett, in Re Scammon, that in cases pending at the time when the act of 1874 took effect, the petitions must be amended so as to show that creditors of the requisite number and value have joined therein; but the question of the effect of the act upon prior adjudications was not considered. 1 Central Law Journal, 328; s. c., 10 N. B. R. 166. The same ruling was made by Mr. District Judge Blatchford in Re Scull, 1 Central Law Journal, 399; s. c., 10 Albany Law Journal, 214; 10 N. B. R. 165. But in this last case there had been no adjudication at the time of the passage of the act of 1874, although the petition had been filed before that time. In Re Joliet Iron and Steel Company, 10 N. B. R. 60; s. c., sub nom. Re Scammon, 6 Chicago Legal News, 328, Mr. District Judge Blodgett rules that in all petitions pending in involutary bankruptcy, commenced since December 1, 1873, where no adjudication had been had, the petitioner must file a sworn amendment to his petition alleging that the petitioners represent one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of the creditors of the bankrupt. Both in this case and in Re Scammon, the leaned judge holds that it is unnecessary that this allegation should be positive; it may be upon information and belief. In Re Hill, 10 N. B. R. 133, a petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed since December 1, 1873, and on March 18, 1874, a memorandum was made by Blatchford, J., on the papers signed with his initials, "let an order, for adjudication be entered," but no action was taken by counsel on either side to have the order entered until after the 22d of June, 1874. Held, that an adjudication had not been made, and that such an order could not be entered unless the petition was made to conform to the requirements of the new law. A rule established by Mr. District Judge Hill, after fully considering this question in Barnett v. Hightower, supra, provides that all involuntary cases commenced before December 1, 1873, and not adjudicated on the 22d of June, 1874, may proceed as though the petition were amended so as to conform to the provisions of the above section, unless objection is made by the defendant. 10 N. B. R. 164; s. c., 1 Central Law Journal, 384. A contrary view was taken by Mr. District Judge Longyear, in Re Buchanan, 1 Central Law Journal, 456. And in Re Keeler, 10 N. B. R. 419, it was held by Mr. District Judge Blatchford, that the absence of the proper allegation as to the number and amount of petitioning creditors is not supplied by an admission in writing that the requisite number and amount have joined in the petition. Such an admission to be noticed by the court must be in writing; must be signed by the debtor, and his signature must be duly authenticated, and it must be verified by oath. Even then the court must be satisfied that the admission was made in good faith before it can adjudge that the requisite number and amount have petitioned. Ibid.

In Re Burch, 10 N. B. R. 150, it was ruled by Mr. District Judge Withey, that a prima facie case must be made by the petition as to the number and value of creditors, this being a material and substantial fact, before the court can acquire jurisdiction to grant an order to show cause. Therefore, when a petition was filed on the 25th day of June, 1874, three days after the amendatory act of 1874 took effect, and the petitioning creditor was at the time ignorant of the passage thereof, this ignorance did not excuse his failure to comply with the above requirement, and his petition was held not amendable, but was dismissed. But see Re Simmons, 1 Central Law Journal, 440, Longyear, J.; s. c., 10 N. B. R. 253; and Re Williams and McPheeters, 7 Chicago Legal New, 49, Woodruff, Circuit J.

If the debtor denies that the requisite number and value of creditors have joined in the petition, his denial must be verified. Re Stienman, 6 Chicago Legal News, 338, Blodgett, J.; Re Hymes, 10 N. B. R. 433, Blatchford, J. The list of his creditors filed by the debtor should be verified in like manner, by the oath of the debtor. Ibid. In this case, by a comparison of the list of creditors filed by the debtor, with the list of petitioning creditors, it appeared that the provable debts due the creditors who had petitioned, did not equal one-third of the aggregate provable debts due to such of the creditors of the debtor as held provable debts exceeding the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, and a reference was made to the clerk to determine the issue. Ibid. The affirmative of such an issue is on the petitioning creditors. Ibid. The debtor must attend at the hearing before the clerk in such a case, and submit to an examination as to all matters pertinent to the issue. Ibid. The clerk must, in such a case, send written or printed notices by mail, postage pre-paid, to all of the creditors named in the list, at the addresses given in the list, of the time and place of reference, and its object, at least ten days before the hearing; such notice to contain a copy of the list, with names, places of residence and amounts. Ibid.

Where petitions were filed against an alleged debtor since December 1, 1873, and the debtor had made a denial, and had demanded a jury trial, and had since filed a demurrer, he was required to file a list of his creditors and the amount of their claims. Warren Savings Bank v. Palmer, 6 Chicago Legal News, 366, McCandless, J.; s. c., 10 N. B. R. 239. But in Re Scammon, 7 Chicago Legal News, 42, Mr. District Judge Blodgett holds, that if it appears that the requisite number and amount of creditors have not joined in the petition, the court will dismiss upon motion without requiring the debtor to file a schedule. "It would be intolerable," said the learned judge, "if any one or two creditors, upon either a real or pretended claim, could by a single allegation, in the words of the amendment, compel a business man to spread upon the records a statement of his liabilities. Such a fishing petition cannot be entertained under the act as amended." We cannot altogether concur in this sentiment. We cannot conceive what principle of public policy is subserved by shielding an insolvent debtor in concealing from those who have given him credit, and confided in him the true state of his liabilities. From the fact that one man has asked and received credit of another, the law ought to imply a promise on his part to render to his creditor a fair, open and truthful account of his condition when required, and nothing less than this can satisfy that honesty and good faith which should always subsist between debtor and creditor. Of course, if such a petition is a mere "fishing" petition, designed to trifle with the time and process of the court, it ought to be rejected, and its authors punished for a contempt. But, nevertheless, the truth wrongs no man. None but the dishonest man of business—he who has dealt fraudulently or designs to deal fraudulently with his creditors—can be interested in concealing from them the true state of his liabilities. The law—or at least equity—loves the truth, courts the light, and despises concealment as the companion of fraud; and while a court of justice should not permit itself to be trifled with, it can have no interest in keeping creditors in the dark as to the condition of their insolvent debtor.

In the same case it was also held that the court would hear affidavits and evidence offered by either party, and would order the person verifying the petition to be examined before the register.

After the requisite number of creditors have joined in the petition, a portion of them will not be permitted to withdraw so as to break the quorum; but it seems that the proceedings may be dismissed, if all join in the application. Re Heffron, 6 Chicago Legal News, 358; s. c., 10 N. B. R. 213.

The same section of the bankrupt act as amended, provides that "the petition of creditors under this section may be sufficiently verified by the oath of the first five signers thereof, if so many there be. And if any of said first five signers shall not reside in the district in which such petition is to be filed, the same may be signed and verified by the oath, or oaths of the attorney or attorneys, agent or agents, of such signers."

Under this provision it has been held, that where there are less than five signers to the petition, and it is verified by an agent, it is not necessary for such agent to state the residence of his principals as the foundation of his right to act in the premises. Re Simmons, 1 Central Law Journal, 440, Longyear, J.; s. c., 10 N. B. R. 253. Where several petitioners join in the petition in separate and distinct rights, each stands as a separate and distinct party to the litigation, so far as the right in which he prosecutes is concerned. It follows that a verification by or on behalf of each petitioner is required. Ibid. When a petition is filed, the court so far acquire jurisdiction, notwithstanding the insufficincy of the verification, that it may allow it to be amended. Ibid.

The same section as amended also contains the following language: "And in computing the number of creditors, as aforesaid, who shall join in such petition, creditors whose respective debts do not exceed two hundred and fifty dollars, shall not be reckoned. But if there be no creditors whose debts exceed said sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, or if the requisite number of creditors holding debts exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars, fail to sign the petition, the creditors having debts of a less amount shall be reckoned for the purposes aforesaid."

An interesting exposition of this provision by Mr. District Judge Blatchford, will be found in Re Hymes, 10 N. B. R. 433. The views of the learned judge may be condensed as follows: In determining whether the requisite proportion of petitioning creditors have joined in the petition, such creditors only should be reckoned whose provable debts exceed two hundred and fifty dollars. And if the petitioning creditors whose provable debts exceed the sum aforesaid, constitute one-fourth in number of the creditors holding provable debts exceeding said sum, the requirment as to the number of petitioning creditors is satisfied. So where the petition is filed on behalf of creditors holding provable debts exceeding the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, in order to ascertain whether the amount of the provable debts held by them is equal to one-third in amount, only the provable debts of creditors which exceed two hundred and fifty dollars must be reckoned. And the requirement of the statute is satisfied if the provable debts due to such petitioning creditors equals one-third of the provable debts due to creditors holding provable debts exceeding the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars. And it is not necessary that the amount of the provable debts of the petitioning creditors should be equal to one third of all the provable debts. The true construction of the above proviso, that "if there be no creditors whose debts exceed said sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, or if the requisite number of creditors holding debts exceeding said sum fail to sign the petition, the creditors having debts of a less amount shall be reckoned for the purpose aforesaid," requires that when creditors having debts of a less amount than two hundred and fifty dollars are reckoned at all, they must be reckoned for all purposes, and in such case the petitioners must constitute one-fourth in number of all creditors, and the amount of their provable debts must be equal to one-third of all the provable debts.

In Re Frost, 7 Chicago Legal News, 42, it is ruled by Mr. District Judge Blodgett, that only those creditors are to be counted whose debts are unconditionally provable. Those claiming liens or holding security cannot be reckoned.

—A SUIT has recently been tried in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Philadelphia, before Mr. Circuit Judge McKennan, in which a check for $100 had been raised by the drawee to $2,100, and paid by the bank; the action being by the drawer of the check to recover of the bank the $2,000 improperly paid. Judge McKennan is reported to have charged the jury that if they believed, from the testimony and from an inspection of the check, that there was nothing unusual in its appearance, nothing which would have been sufficient to put a careful person upon his guard, then they should find for the defendants; if otherwise, their verdict should be for the plaintiffs. The paying tellers of several banks having testified that there was nothing in the appearance of the check, as raised, to excite suspicion, the jury rendered a verdict for the bank.

Federal Court Jurisdiction—Union Pacific Railroad Company.

UNITED STATES, ON RELATION OF HALL et al. v. UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

[S. C., ante, 288.]

and " JOHN LOVE, District Judge.

1. Union Pacific Railroad—Jurisdiction—Mandamus—Service of Process.—The Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa, under the acts of Congress relating to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, has jurisdiction in mandamus to compel that company to operate its road as required by law, if any part of the road is in the district of Iowa; and under the act of June 20, 1874, service of process may be made upon the president or general superintendent of the company, found in the district of Iowa.

The alternative writ of mandamus awarded at the last term was served upon the president and general superintendent of the company at Council Bluffs, in this district.

The marshal's return on alternative writ of mandamus is as follows:

"This writ came into my hands on the 10th day of June, A. D., 1874, and on the same day I served the same on Sidney Dillon, president of the within-named defendant, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, at the transfer grounds of said company, in the city of Council Bluffs, county of Pottawattamie, Iowa, by delivering to him a true copy thereof, and offering to read to him the within writ, which he then and there waived, and on the same day I served the within writ on S. H. H. Clark, general superintendent of the within named defendant, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, by delivering to him a true copy thereof, and offering to read the original, which he then and there waived; all done at the transfer grounds of said Union Pacific Railroad Company, in the city of Council Bluffs, Pottawattamie county, Iowa."

The company made a special appearance, and excepted to the sufficiency of this service, and moved to quash the same.

In support of the motion, the following affidavit was filed:

A. J. Poppleton, being duly sworn, says, that for several years, last past he has been, and now is, the attorney of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, defendant in this action. That said corporation is created by, and organized under, a law of the United States; that, by a certain joint resolution of Congress, passed and approved April 10th, 1869, the stockholders of said company were authorized to establish their general office at such place as they might select at a meeting to be held in the city of Boston, April 22, 1869; that at such meeting said city of Boston was by said stockholders selected, and its general offices established in said city, where it has ever since remained. That in said city, in the state of Massachusetts, all the meetings of its board of directors are held, and its books and records kept, and that all its officers are residents of said city, except its president, who resides in the state of New York; that it has no other office or place where its legislative corporate power is exercised; that its managing office, where the power and authority of its managing agents, to-wit: Superintendent, auditor, cashier, general freight and ticket agents is exercised, is wielded, is in the city of Omaha and state of Nebraska, and it has no general managing office elsewhere; that the alleged service of the writ in this action was made on Sidney Dillon, president of said company, while casually traveling through the district of Iowa, he being at the same time a resident of the city and state of New York, and that defendant has and owns no railroad situated in the state of Iowa, except such portion of the iron track laid over and across its Missouri River Bridge and the approaches thereto as are East of the boundary line, between the states of Iowa and Nebraska.

That said S. H. H. Clark, general superintendent, upon whom said alleged service was also made, resides, and has his office at Omaha, Nebraska, and that neither the said Dillon, president, nor Clark, superintendent, neither reside or have an office in the state of Iowa.

A. J. POPPLETON.

Subscribed and sown to by A. J. Poppleton, before me, October 13th, 1874. GEORGE B. CORKWILL, Clerk.

John N. Rogers, for relators; J. M. Woolworth, and A. J. Poppleton, for R. R. Co.

DILLON, Circuit Judge, on overruling these exceptions, in orally delivering the judgment of the court, in substance said:

This is a proceeding instituted by certain persons residing in Council Bluffs, in this state, who claim that they are aggrieved by reason of an alleged failure of the Union Pacific Railroad Company to operate its road according to law.

The 15th section of the act of 1864, which was an act amending the original charter of this company—giving it additional subsidies and additional grants of land—by means of which in reality the road was subsequently constructed, provided that it should be the duty of the company to operate its road, so far as the government and the public were cencerned, as one continuous line.

In this case it is alleged that the company refuses to operate their road as a continuous line; that in fact they operate it as one continuous line as far only as the city of Omaha, and there break its continuity by the agency of a distinct and separate transfer from that point to the Iowa side. This is the complaint which the relators make, and which they allege to be in violation of the terms of the charter of the company and its duty to the public. 2 Dillon Cir. Court Rep., 527.

In 1873 Congress passed an act in these words: "The proper Circuit Court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine all cases of mandamus to compel the said Union Pacific Railroad Company to operate its road as required by law." This was an act which was indispensable in order to give the federal court original jurisdiction in mandamus, and was passed for that purpose. 2 Dillon, 527. This proceeding heretofore came before us on two questions. The one was, "Whether private persons could move for the writ; that is, could institute these proceedings to compel the road to perform its public duty, or whether the proceeding must not be instituted by the attorney-general." We have decided at the last term, that the writ was well moved; that if private persons could show that they were interested in the operation of the road, they had a right to come into court under this act and call the company to account for failing to perform its public duty, to their injury, and thereupon award the alternative writ.

On the other question, whether the Circuit Court of the District of Iowa was the "proper circuit court" before which to bring this proceeding, we gave no opinion. The act of June, 1874, makes an addition to the 15th section of the act of July, 1864, and provides that there shall be added to it the following words: "Any officer or agent of the company who is authorized to construct the aforesaid road, or of any company engaged in operating either of said roads, who shall refuse to operate and use the road or telegraph lines under his control or which he is engaged in operating, for purposes of communication, travel and transportation, so far as the public and the government are concerned, as one continuous line, and without discrimination of any kind, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined and imprisoned.

This act makes it the personal duty of the officers of the road to operate it as one continuous line. Now, if it can be shown that the president of the road is not operating it as a continuous line, within the meaning of this act of Congress, then he is guilty and may be punished, and we do not think for the violation of the act in this respect he can be protected by any resolution of the board of directors. The law says: "You shall operate this road on one continuous line," and enjoins this duty upon the officers of the road. In the next sentence the phraseology changes: In case of failure or refusal of the Union Pacific railroad, or either of said branches to comply with the requirements of this act, and the act to which this is amendatory, an action against them may be brought in the District or Circuit Court of the United States, in the territory, district or circuit in which the road or any portion of it may be situated, for damages on account of such failure or refusal. The action must be brought in the court of some district in which some portion of the road of the defendants is situated.

Now, in this proceeding, it is alleged that a portion of the road which this company refuses to operate as one continuous line, is situated within the geographical limits of the state of Iowa. On this motion we must take this to be true. The act of 1874 provides, that if process in any suit is served upon any agent of the defendant found within the territory, district, or circuit in which such suit may be brought, such service shall be held by the court to be good and sufficient. In this case the alternative writ of mandamus was served upon the president and the general superinpendent of the company at Council Bluffs, in this state, and the question is, whether this is a sufficient service to give this court jurisdiction, assuming that some portion of the road of the defendant is in this district, and assuming that the road is not operated as required by law. It is of course to be regretted that the phraseology of the act is not so clear as to admit of no controversy; and yet, when we consider that it is our duty to carry out the intention of Congress, so far as we can learn it, it does seem to us that it admits of very little doubt that this is, upon the assumptions above mentioned, a proper circuit court.

The writ of mandamus may go to the corporation, to the corporate body and command it to perform its duty (granting that any part of the road is in this district), and if this writ, thus commanding this duty, is served upon the chief officer of the corporation, its president, or upon any officer who may be indicted and criminally punished, if he fails to do his duty in this respect, then it seems to us the court has jurisdiction over the company and its officers, by mandamus, to compel the performance of this duty. This writ may, perhaps, run also under the act of 1874, to the president of the company:—"You are hereby commanded to operate the road as one continuous line."

Under this act, this is a duty which he can and should perform. He can be criminally punished if he does not perform it, and it is no protection to him that the board of directors has ordered him to do something else. The writ of mandamus may be served upon him, and he is obliged to respond to it, whether it be regarded as a proceeding against him as an officer, or whether it be regarded as against the corporation.

The argument is this: The act of 1874 enjoins the duty to operate the road as one continuous line, upon the officers engaged in operating the road; if they refuse to do so they are made indictable.

The duty to be performed by them is one which rests upon the officers as well as the corporation; otherwise Congress would not have made it criminal for the officers to refuse to discharge it. It is their duty to obey the law; if they fail they may be proceeded against criminally, and the public duty may be enforced by mandamus, and this writ may be directed to the corporation and served as required by the act of June 20, 1874, or perhaps to the president or officers who are made subject to indictment under that act, and served upon them if found within the district. Whether any portion of the road of the company is within this district, and whether the transfer between Omaha and Council Bluffs, by means of the "Omaha Bridge Transfer," which is the subject of the relators' complaint, is in violation of the duty of the company or its officers, as enjoined by law, are questions which are not passed upon on the present motion.

And again, considering that the original charter of the company, as well as the act of March 3, 1873, provided no mode of service, and that the act of 1874 was designed to enforce the duty enjoined by the 15th section of the act of 1864, all these acts are to be construed as in pari materia, and thus regarded, any proceeding or suit to enforce the duty enjoined by the 15th section, may be instituted in the proper court, and the proper court, as prescribed by the act of 1874, is one in the district in which some part of the company's road is situated, and in any such proceeding or suit the process may be served upon the company's agents found in the district; and in this proceeding by mandamus, our judgment is, that service of the writ upon the president or any officer whose duty it is to see that the road is operated as required by law, is sufficient. Exceptions to service of alternative writ overruled.

Negligence by Carriers—Loss of Goods by Flood.

VAUGHN v. NASHVILLE AND CHATTANOOGA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, Knoxville, September 26, 1874.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY,
" ROBERT MCFARLAND,
" JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
" THOS. J. FREEMAN,
" JOHN L. T. SNEED,

In an action against a railway company for damages for the non-delivery of goods entrusted to it as a carrier, where the defence is that the damage occurred through an extraordinary and unprecedented flood, it is competent to prove, that at the time and place of the flood, a portion of the track of another railway company near by, was unoccupied and not overflowed, and that the defendants' cars could have been transferred to said track, but that the use of said track was not tendered to the defendants by the company owning it, nor was its use requested by the defendants. If the transfer to the other track was fairly within their power in the use of such diligence, consistent with the surrounding circumstances and duties, and the same could have been obtained without trespassing on the rights of the other company, but by their consent, then it would have been the duty of the defendants to have so moved the car in which the goods in question were, and thus saved them from damage. And whether this could have been done was a question of fact for the jury.

FREEMAN, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff alleges the delivery of nineteen hundred yards of linen to the defendant, as common carrier, to be safely carried from Chattanooga, Tennessee, to Louisville, Ky., and then delivered by the defendant to L. G. Henry & Co., on account of plaintiff, and avers a failure so to deliver, and damages as a consequence to the amount of two thousand dollars. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and gave notice that on the trial of the cause it would insist in defence, that the grievance complained of resulted from an extraordinary rise in the Tennessee river.

The first question presented and urged by the defendants for reversal of the judgment, is the admission of testimony of one Ragsdale, the agent of the East T. & Georgia R. R. Company, to the effect that cars could be transferred from defendant's road to aid East Tennessee & Georgia road, by means of the track and switches, and that there was a portion of the track of said last road, that was not overflowed, near by, within the corporation of Chattanooga. He proved further, that a portion of this high track was not occupied at the time of the unprecedented flood which caused the damage complained of, but that said track was not tendered to the defendant, nor was its use requested by them. It is insisted this was within the principle of the case of David, decided at the September term, 1872, of this court. In that case it was held not error to exclude testimony showing that prudent business men in Chattanooga, upon the same height of ground as the railroad, lost goods by the flood. In other words, that the fact that other men lost goods, had no proper tendency to prove, or disprove, the question involved in the case, as to whether the defendants "had used the precaution and vigilance which the law imposed on them under the circumstances." This ruling was unquestionably correct, but we do not think the questions presented are the same. In this case the effort was not to show that others lost or saved their goods in Chattanooga by the flood, but to show that the defendants, by the precaution of moving the threatened car on to another road, conveniently situated, might have saved the goods from damage by the flood. The question is whether, in this view of the case, the evidence was admissible, and whether, if such was the fact, it was the duty of the company to so remove the car. It is insisted by defendant, that no such duty was imposed; that this would have been to require an extraordinary amount of diligence on the part of the railroad, not imposed by law.

The case of Empire Transportation Co. v. Wallace, 68 Penn. St. 302, is cited in support of this view of the case. The rule is there correctly laid down by Judge Sharswood, in reference to the duty of the carrier to transport the goods by the usual route, and within a reasonable time, when no time is specified in the contract. He adds: "He must use reasonable expedition, but is not bound to extraordinary exertions, or to incur expenses in order to surmount obstacles not caused by his own default, but by the weather or other act of Providence. Redf. on Carriers, 210, 220. This was an action for failure to carry oil shipped from Pennsylvania to Boston, by way of Philadelphia. The usual route was by water from the latter place, and defendants had the option to ship by rail or water; water communication was prevented, for the time, by ice, and it was insisted that defendants should have incurred, what at the time would have been an extraordinary expense, and shipped the oil by rail. The court held, under the above rule, that the company was not bound to ship by rail, as the court below had ruled. This ruling was correct, but that case is not the same as the one now under consideration. The question here is, whether, when the article shipped and agreed to be carried was suddenly exposed to an extraordinary peril, it was not reasonable diligence to remove it from that peril by transferring it to the convenient road above overflow, not for the purpose of transporting it to its destination by that route, but for its preservation from damage or destruction while in its possession We think the sound rule is, that if by the use of such active diligence, and of such means as would be suggested to, and within the knowledge and capacity of well informed and competent business men in such position, the article could have been saved, it was their duty to have used such means. If the transfer to the other track was fairly within their power, in the use of such diligence, consistent with the surrounding circumstances and duties, and the same could have been obtained without trespassing on the rights of the other company, but by their consent, then it would have been the duty of defendants to have so moved the car, and thus saved it from damage. This would have been a question of fact for the jury, under the instructions of the court. In this view of the case, we cannot say the facts shown were not competent to go to the jury on the question, whether the defendant had used reasonable efforts, under the circumstances, to preserve the goods from injury. This must be so, unless we hold, that the defendant could not be required to remove the goods from their own track or cars temporarily, but might keep them there, although threatened with destruction, when such removal could, by reasonable efforts and energy, have been effected, and this simply because, by their contract, they were only bound to transport, by the usual route, to the place of destination. We do not think such a rule can be fairly sustained, either on sound principle or authority. See Redfield on Carriers, Sec. 237, 304, 358.

In reference to several points of objection made in argument, and authorities referred to, we need but say, that any delay in the transportation of the goods, would clearly, on principle and authority, be excused and not create liability on the part of the company, when such delay was the result of providential causes, such as the freezing of the river, in the case from Pennsylvania, or loss of the company's bridges, in case referred to by Mr. Redfield. Sec. 304, 305. So the freshet in this case, and the falling of a rock on the road from Lookout Mountain, would have excused any delay occasioned by these causes. But then it was the duty of the company, as soon as might be after removal of the obstructions, to proceed in performance of their contract. This action is brought for failure to carry safely and deliver at all, as by the terms of their receipt they were bound to do. See Hadley v. Clarke, 8 Term Reports, 259; cited, Redfield on Carriers, Note 1, to p. 221. The temporary obstruction does not avoid the contract—only suspends the execution of it. Angell on Carriers, § 289.

Without examining in detail all the questions suggested in argument, after a critical examination of the charge of his honor, we think it laid down the rules of law, applicable to the questions involved, correctly. As to whether the evidence sustains the verdict, we have but to say, that the question was fairly submitted to the jury on the facts, and we see no cause to disturb it.

AFFIRM THE JUDGMENT.

Remedy in State Court against National Bank to Recover Penalty for taking Usurious Interest.

E. STEADMAN et al. v. E. F. REDFIELD & CO. AND THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CHATTANOOGA.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, Knoxville, September Term, 1874.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY,
" ROBERT MCFARLAND,
" JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
" JOHN L. T. SNEED,
" THOMAS J. FREEMAN,

The act of Congress creating a system of national banks, fixes the rate of interest to be charged by the banks, and prescribes a penalty and a remedy for its recovery; and the Tennessee code, section 1995, provides, that where usury has been charged, a creditor of the party paying it may recover it back. The complainant alleges that the defendant—the bank—charged its co-defendant usury, and sought to recover under the code, as a creditor of the party paying the usury, the amount usuriously received. The court hold that the penalty and remedy prescribed by the act of Congress is not the exclusive remedy against a national bank in such case, and that a creditor is not thereby precluded from sueing the bank for usury received of a debtor, under the state laws.

MCFARLAND, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This bill was filed under section 1955 of our code—the complainants alleging that they are judgment creditors of the defendants, E. F. Redfield & Co., and that in transaction with the First National Bank of Chattanooga, the bank had received from Redfield & Co. an amount of usury for the loan of money sufficient to pay complainants' judgments, and complainants seek by this bill to recover the same from the bank. Defence was first made by demurrer, which was overruled, and then by plea, which was held sufficient, and the bill dismissed. The defence is this: that the bank was organized under the acts of Congress establishing the system of national banks; that the act fixes the rate of interest to be charged by the bank to be the rate fixed by the laws of the state where the bank is situated, and the act of Congress further prescribes certain penalties and forfeitures for taking a greater rate of interest than is thus allowed to be charged, and among these penalties the right of a creditor of the borrower to sue and recover back the usury is not included. And it is maintained that this penalty and remedy is exclusive of all others, and that none other can be allowed.

The penalty prescribed by the act of Congress is double the amount of interest paid, to be recovered back by the person paying the same, or his legal representative, if sued for in two years.

The remedy given by our code, sec. 1955, is to recover back the usury paid, and this remedy is also given to a judgment creditor of the party paying it. The principle contended for, that when a penalty is prescribed by statute, and the remedy for its recovery is also given, that the penalty cannot be recovered in any other mode, is no doubt correct; and from this we may conclude, that the penalty prescribed in the act of Congress cannot be recovered by a creditor of the party paying the usury, as the remedy prescribed by the the act is only given to the party paying, or his legal representative.

It will be observed, however, that this bill does not seek to recover this penalty. The penalty fixed by the act of Congress is double the amount of the entire interest paid; this is in the nature of a fine, or punishment for the violation of the law, for it allows the party to recover more than he would otherwise be entitled to. This bill only seeks to recover back the usury, that is, the excess over the lawful interest. There is in this nothing in the nature of a penalty—it simply requires the bank to pay back the money to which it is not lawfully entitled, leaving it to retain all lawful interest.

To compel the party to do simple justice, has nothing in it in the nature of punishment. This recovery is allowed by the laws of the state, if they are applicable.

It may be conceded that where Congress has rightfully legislated upon a subject, a state legislature has no power to legislate in conflict therewith; and that the legislature of the state has no power to pass laws with special reference to national banks, upon the matters embraced in the acts of Congress. But it seems manifest "that a national bank must, in other respects, be subject to the general laws of the state where it is located; that their contracts are governed and construed by the state laws. Their acquisition and transfer of property, their right to collect their debts, and their liability to be sued for debts, are all based on state laws." Such is, in substance, the language of Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, in The Bank v. Commonweath, 9 Wallace, 353.

As already said, the recovery here sought is no part of the punishment prescribed by the laws of our state. Our law makes usury indictable as a misdemeanor. Whether the penalty prescribed by the act of Congress in question would preclude an indictment under our state laws for the same offence, is a question not involved here. There is a class of cases where it has been held, that the same act constituted an offence against both governments, and is punishable by both. But we need not enter into a discussion of this subject; nor need we discuss what would be the effect of a recovery in a case of this character upon the right to enforce the penalty prescribed by the act of Congress. Ordinarily, a party guilty of usury could not escape punishment by refunding the usury, and so, we suppose, if he were compelled by law to refund it, the question of his punishment for the offence would not be thereby affected. Nor need we discuss what would be the effect upon the right of a creditor to recover, in a case of this character, if it should appear that the penalty prescribed by the act of Congress had been received; this is not averred, nor does it appear that the bank is now liable for the penalty, as the limitation of two years has probably elapsed.

We have not found, in the authorities furnished us, any satisfactory discussion of this question. While the language of some of the judges, in some of the cases, seems to bear upon the question, yet their language has reference to a different state of facts, and really different questions, and therefore they should not be regarded as deciding this question.

We are of the opinion that the act of Congress prescribing a penalty as a punishment for violating the law, was not intended to preclude the state courts from compelling the usurer to do simple justice, according to its own laws, by restoring the usury to the party from whom it was received, or his creditor, especially where it does not appear that the penalty has been enforced, or is now subject to be enforced. In this view, the plea was insufficient. The decree will be reversed, and the plea held insufficent. The cause is remanded for an answer, the bank paying the costs of this court.

REVERSED AND REMANDED.

Replevin for Promissory Note—Effect of Judgment—Res Judicata.

CHARLES B. WAITE v. J. D. TRIBLECOCK.

United States Circuit Court, District of Iowa, May Term, 1874.

and " JOHN LOVE, District Judge.

Judgment in an undefended action of replevin for a note in favor of the maker, which action was brought upon the ground that the note had been obtained by fraud, and in which only the banker having the note for the collection of interest thereon was made a defendant, was, held under the circumstances, not to bar the owner of the note (an indorsee thereof for value before maturity) from maintaining an action thereon against the maker.

The defendant gave his negotiable note, secured by mortgage, for 20 per cent. of stock subscribed in the Great Western Insurance Company of Chicago; that being the cash payment required by the company. This note and mortgage were sold and assigned by the company to the complainant, a citizen of Illinois, before due, and as the court decided, for value. The note was sent by the complainant to one Ellis, a banker in Iowa, for collection of interest. While in the possession of the banker for that purpose, the defendant brought an action of replevin in the state court against the banker as defendant, for the note, and on the writ of replevin, obtained possession thereof. The ground of the replevin action was, that as the note had been obtained by fraud, the makers were entitled to its possession.

The present complainant did not appear to the replevin action, nor was he made, nor did he make, himself a party to it. Judgment was given in the replevin action for the plaintiffs therein. In the present bill to foreclose the mortgage, the defendant pleaded specially the judgment on the replevin action as a conclusive bar to the complainant's right to foreclose the mortgage.

Clark and Harbert, for the complainant; H. H. Trimble, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge, in disposing of this question, said orally, in substance:

The special defence, that the plaintiff is concluded by the judgment in replevin in the state court, is not well founded in law.

The pleadings in that case go upon the idea that the Great Western Insurance Company was the owner of the notes, and that the defendant therein, Ellis, was the agent of the company. The findings in the judgment of the state court as to Waite, the present complainant, are outside of the issues and void. Waite was the owner of the note, and the indorsement on the note so disclosed, and if he was to be bound, should have been made a party to the replevin action. Besides, his claim of ownership to the notes was known to the plaintiff in replevin long before the cause was tried, and they refused to make Waite a party.

Ellis was in the interest of the plaintiffs in that suit, and no defence in fact was made, and there was no trial on the merits as respects Waite, the real owner. Jones was employed as an attorney in the replevin suit by the insurance company, and not by Waite.

Whether the validity of the note could have been tried in an action of replevin in the manner sought, had the real owner been a party, need not be decided. The action of replevin is not one in rem, and to give jurisdiction over the person, he must be a party. Ellis sustained no such relation to the note or to Waite as to make the judgment against him which he did not defend for Waite, conclusive on him. It is res inter alios acta as to Waite.

Liability of Express Companies for Goods Lost in Railroad Accidents—Judge Ballard's Recent Decision.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—The opinion of Judge Ballard in the case of the Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Express Company, delivered in the Circuit Court of the United States (District of Kentucky), is reviewed in your CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, of October 1st, 1874, pp. 498–500. The importance of the question involved, renders it proper in the profession to subject the opinion to a re-examination of the principles and authorities upon which it relies. It has attracted much legal attention, and has provoked many comments, but none more suggestive than those of your correspondent in the review referred to.

Agreeing as I do with the decision, I will endeavor to point out what I conceive to be the misapprehension of the learned correspondent as to the principles announced by the court, and then to invoke authorities, which, though differing with those cited by the able reviewer, must convince him that he has read but one side of the question, and that he has overlooked those cases which are decisive in a federal court. Your correspondent, in his letter of October 1st, has not quoted the language of the court which he undertakes to criticise, but has inferred a statement of principles which is nowhere to be found in the opinion. I will quote from the review: "The bank sued for the money upon the theory that the fire occurred through the negligence of the defendant, or of some one else, whose negligence was imputed to the defendant, and claimed on the trial that the evidence showed negligence on the part of the railroad company, and that the defendant was liable to the the plaintiff for a loss occasioned by such negligence. But the court instructed the jury, that they should disregard the evidence on the question of negligence of the railroad company, holding that in such case the defendant is only responsible for the negligence of itself and its employees." To sustain this view of the case, the learned judge assumes, that the express company is but an "ordinary bailee for hire," is only bound to ordinary diligence of itself or its servants, and as the railroad company was not its servant, it was in no way responsible for the negligence of those who controlled the railroad and its carriages. The whole opinion is based upon these propositions, and is made up of illustrations based upon them. "Now the principle inferred here as underlying the opinion of the court is, that the express company 'is but an ordinary bailee for hire,' and is only bound to ordinary diligence; whereas the court distinctly held in the very first instruction given, "that the Southern Express Company and the Adams Express are common carriers. What Judge Ballard decided is, that the Adams Express Company was a common carrier, and as such liable for the safety of the values intrusted to it for transportation; that it was not liable for the loss of this package of money, because this loss was caused by fire, and by the express contract it was not to be responsible for loss by fire. If a common carrier may, by express contract with the consignor, limit, modify, or reduce his common law liability, then the Adams Express Company had a right, by express contract, to limit its common law liability. If it be lawful for a common carrier to contract against his common law liability for loss by fire, then the Adams' Express Company had a right, by express contract, to limit its common law liability for loss by fire of this package. The express contract against the defendant's liability for loss by fire was made in this case, and it was a lawful contract, such as it is now everywhere admitted common carriers may make. Grace v. Adams, etc., 100 Mass. 505; Holford v. Adams, 2 Duer, 480; York Co. v. Ill. Central R. R., 3 Wallace 107. The position taken by Judge Ballard, therefore, is not the position assumed by your learned correspondent to have been taken. The principle decided by Judge Ballard is this: That a common carrier may, by express contract with the shipper, limit, modify or reduce his common law liability; that an express contract against his common law liability for loss by fire is lawful, and when such a contract is made, and a loss by fire occurs, the common carrier is not liable under his common law liability as a common carrier, but is liable only as an ordinary bailee for hire. The Adams Express Company is a common carrier; it made an express contract with the shipper of this money, not to be liable for its loss by fire as a common carrier; this package was lost by fire, therefore this common carrier was, for the loss from this particular cause, not liable as a common carrier, but being a bailee for hire, it was liable as an ordinary bailee for hire would be. Let us try this position by principle and authority. The general liability of the carrier, independently of any special argreement, is familiar. He is chargeable as an insurer of the goods, and accountable for any damage or loss that may happen to them in the course of the conveyance, unless arising from inevitable accident—in other words, the act of God or the public enemy. Suppose, therefore, a loss were to happen from the act of God or the public enemy. The common carrier being the bailee for hire in possession, would for that loss not be liable, unless his liability could be grounded on his duties as a bailee for hire; that is, on his duty not negligently to expose the goods to the overwhelming causes of destruction. The gist of the action in such a case would not be his common law contract of carrier, but his negligence as a bailee. When in the case supposed the carrier has shown the destruction of the goods by the act of God or the public enemy, it is not also necessary for him to show that he exercised great diligence, and that he was not negligent, but the burden of proof shifts to the shipper, and he must aver and show negligence, and there place the carrier's liability upon the ground upon which an ordinary bailee for hire would be liable. We have already seen that a common carrier may, by special agreement, restrict his common law liability. The law as it now stands, therefore, may be formulated thus: "A common carrier is chargeable as an insurer of the goods, and accountable for any damage or loss that may happen to them in the course of the conveyance, unless arising from inevitable accident, that is to say, the act of God or the public enemy, or from causes against the liability for which a special agreement has been made." If, therefore, a loss happened from the act of God or the public enemy, or from causes against the liability for which a special agreement has been made, the ground of recovery against the bailee is not the common law contract of the carrier's insurance, but the negligence of the bailee for hire, and when this is the ground it must be averred and proven by the owner. In New Jersey Steam Navigation Company v. Merchants' Bank, 6 Howard, 385, the recovery is distinctly placed upon the ground of "great want of care, and which amounts to gross negligence on the part of the respondent in the stowage of the cotton," and the principle here set forth perspicuously recognized. "The respondents having succeeded in restricting their liability as carriers, by the special agreement, the burden of proving that the loss was occasioned by the want of care, or by gross negligence, lies on the libellants, which would be otherwise in the absence of such restriction." Ibid. 384.

In Clark, etc. v. Barnwell et al., libel for damages to 24 boxes of cotton thread, the supreme court, by Justice Nelson, say: "For as the masters and owners, like other common carriers, may be answerable for the goods, although no actual blame is imputable to them, and unless they bring the case within the exception, in considering whether they are chargeable for a particular loss, the question is, not whether the loss happened by reason of the negligence of the persons employed in the conveyance of the goods, but whether it was occasioned by any of those causes which, either according to the general rules of law, or the particular stipulations of the parties, offer an excuse for the nonperformance of the contract after the damage to the goods, therefore, has been established, the burden lies upon the respondents to show that it was occasioned by one of the perils from which they were exempted by the bill of lading, and even where evidence has been thus given, bringing the particular loss and damage within one of the dangers or accidents of the navigation, it is still competent for the shippers to show that it might have been avoided by exercise of reasonable skill and attention on the part of the persons employed in the conveyance of the goods; further, it is not deemed to be, in the sense of the law, such a loss as will exempt the carrier from liability, but rather a loss occasioned by his negligence and inattention to his duty."

Hence it is, that although the loss occurs by a peril of the sea, yet if it might have been avoided by skill and diligence at the time, the carrier is liable. But in this stage and posture of the case, the burden is upon the plaintiff to establish the negligence, as the affirmative lies upon him, (12 Howard 280); and this doctrine so clearly laid down by Justice Nelson, is re-affirmed in Transportation Company v. Downer, 11th Wallace, 133, and the authority cited by your correspondent, of Graham v. Davis, 4 Ohio State 363, was relied on in the argument, and overturned by the decision of the supreme court.

So, that however there may be a conflict of authorities in the states upon this branch of the inquiry, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are decisive of the question, when that question comes to be tried in a federal court. To argue, as your learned correspondent does, that the Adams Express Company is liable notwithstanding its special contract in this case, because it is liable for its employee, the Nashville Railroad Company, which, by the breaking of its bridge, caused the fire and the loss, is to loose sight of the point first made. I agree, and Judge Ballard admits in his opinion, that the express company, as a common carrier without special agreement limiting its liability, would be responsible for the loss by the Nashville Railroad Company, which it employed. But as an ordinary bailee for hire, which, respecting the loss by fire it had become by the special agreement, it is liable only for its own negligence, or that of its servants or agents. The express company was not negligent in transporting the package of money over the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, because that was contemplated by both parties, and was therefore authorized. It was not negligent in breaking the bridge, because it did not break it—it was not negligent in suffering it to break by its agents or servants, because the Nashville Railroad was neither its agent nor its servant.

In the case of Buckland et al. v. Adams Express Company, the court holds the company liable, because, under the evidence in the case, there was no special agreement to limit the carrier's common law liability, and they hold the common carrier liable as such for his sub-contractor. The decision of the court explicitly rests upon this ground. I quote from the opinion:

"On a consideration of the facts stated, it does not appear to us that the plaintiffs ever did agree that the merchandize in question should be transported on the terms set forth in the receipt which was delivered to the workman at the manufactory, when the package was delivered to defendant's agent. It is not stated that the plaintiffs, or either of them, ever read the paper containing the alleged regulations, or one similar to it." 97 Mass. 132. And, without quoting from the other cases relied on for the contrary view, they will be found to rest upon the same ground, or to have ignored the distinction I have attempted to trace between a common carrier without special agreement, and a common carrier who has limited his responsibility to that of an ordinary bailee for hire. It remains only to examine the grounds upon which an ordinary bailee for hire is held responsible for damage caused by others. The matter is so well stated in Norton v. Wiswall, 26 Barbour. 620, that I will quote: "I am not able to see how any person can be made responsible for a particular transaction, or for the consequences flowing from it, unless he has been in some way personally engaged in it, or instrumental in bringing it about, or the relation between him and the person who inflicts the injury complained of, be that of partner, or master and servant, or some other involving the principle of agency. Where one is the master or principal of another, he is responsible for his acts within the scope of his employment, because he has conferred authority upon the latter to do the act, and because he has the power and the legal right to control his conduct. Where one is the partner of another, he is liable for his acts within the scope of his partnership, because he has agreed to be so, and because the very nature and object of this relation imply that each acts within the authority and assent of the other. But where the parties stand towards each other simply in the light of contracting parties, having no relation towards each other which draws into operation the principle of agency, the rule does not apply."

I contend, therefore, that the express company is not liable for this particular loss, except as a forwarder or an ordinary bailee for hire would be, that is, for ordinary diligence in selecting proper means for the transportation of the goods. Brown v. Denison, 2 Wend. 593.

To sum up, I hold that the contract between the Bank of Kentucky and the Adams Express Company, is this: The express company undertook to carry this package of money, and to be responsible for its safety as a common carrier, but for the loss by fire the company expressly stipulated, that it would not be liable as a common carrier, but would only assume the liability of an ordinary bailee for hire. The package was destroyed by fire; the company was not guilty of negligence in selecting the L. & N. R. R., and the neglect in the breaking of the bridge was not the neglect of the company, or of its agents or servants. The railroad was an independent contractor, and not the agent or servant of the Adams Express Company, therefore the Adams Express Company was not negligent itself, or by its agents or servants, and is, therefore, not liable under its contract in this case. LEX.

Relative Importance of Case-Law.

English Case-Law may be divided for the purposes of the present enquiry into reported and unreported decisions.

As to the reported decisions, a distinction has been made regarding the value to be attached to different reports of the same case, and particularly as to whether or not the decision has appeared in what are known as the regular reports. Again, as to reported decisions, a further subdivision may be made, based upon the difference in the tribunals where the decision has been given, as for instance in Chambers, at nisi prius, in banc or in appeal.

Dealing first and briefly with unreported decisions, they are generally the refuge of the hard-pressed counsel, who, finding nothing to justify his position, adopts the expedient of invoking the shadowy authority of some traditional case "just in point." These sort of authorities have been jocularly called "pocket-pistol law," and the citation of them is hardly justified even by the necessities of counsel. The judicial estimate of such authorities is well indicated in the observations of the Master of the Rolls, in Knight v. Boyer, 23 Beav. 627. Referring to an unreported decision which had been cited, he remarks: "This case is not reported either in print or manuscript, but the case is cited from the proceedings in the cause filed in the chancery office. It is extremely difficult to rest safely on a case not reported by any competent person, when the grounds of the decision are to be picked out of the facts appearing on the recorded proceedings alone, when, if the case had been reported, it might have been found that, in truth, some other matter than that supposed was the principal cause of the dismissal of the bill. If the case had been seriously argued it would probably have been reported."

Next, as to the so-called unauthorized reports, the rule is now pretty well established that no judge will refuse to refer to, and act upon, a case simply because it does not appear in the regular reports. The decisions reported in the Law Journal, Law Times and Weekly Reporter, in advance of the regular series, are, and have long been, of great value to the profession. Indeed, in many cases, it has been matter of observation from the bench, that a report in the serials has elucidated the more obscure report of the same case in the official reports. In Francome v. Francome, 11 Jur. N. S. 123, Lord Chancellor Westbury observed: "I do not decline to follow the case cited because it is reported in the unauthorized reports. 18 Jur. 1051. It is of such materials that the law of England is made up, and I should be denying myself much valuable assistance in ascertaining what the law is, if I were to refuse to receive the citation of cases reported by barristers in those useful publications." See also, per Stuart, V. C., in S. C. 11 L. T. N. S. 666. In a recent decision of the full court of chancery, in this province, Bank of Montreal v. McFaul, 17 Gr. 234, the majority of the court gave effect to a decision reported only in the Weekly Reporter (Defries v. Smith, 10 W. R. 189), though the chancellor declined to follow it, and dissented from the judgment of the court. In Iansen v. Paxton, 23 U. C. C. P. 457, Richards, C. J., observes: "The Law Journal reports have generally been favourably spoken of, both by the profession and the bench."

We notice that the present master of the rolls, Sir George Jessel, has said that the Weekly Notes are not intended for citation as authorities, and he has refused to allow them to be cited before him. Attorney-General v. Cockermouth Board, 22 W. R. 620. But surely they are of worth at least equal to the Notes of Cases, which are frequently referred to in maritime and ecclesiastical causes, and their value as pro tempore guides, till the fuller reports appear, should not be overlooked.

Coming next to the regularly reported cases, perhaps those lowest and of least authority are nisi prius decisions. In many cases these rulings and holdings are necessarily given on the spur of the moment, and before publication require the careful pruning and consideration which Campbell gave to his reports. They are also useful when accompanied by the elaborate system of commentary, which Foster and Finlason append to the cases reported by them. But the judges themselves are not well satisfied with such cases being reported, and do not deem them of much value when cited before them in banc, as will appear from the few quotations which follow:

"As to the nisi prius cases, it would have been much better for the law if the crude opinions of judges at nisi prius had never been allowed to be quoted to those who are sitting in banc:" per Best, J., in Rowe v. Young, 2 B. & B. 185. "Very likely one's first thoughts at nisi prius may be wrong, and I am extremely sorry they are ever reported; and still more so that they are ever mentioned again:" per Bayley, J., in 1 Chit. R. 121. "A sad use is made of these nisi prius cases:" Gibbs, C. J., in Tompkins v. Wiltshire, 1 Marsh. 116. See per Best, C. J., in Johnson v. Lawson, 2 Bing. 86. "Buck v. Stacey, 2 C. & P. 465, has been approved of by eminent judges, and so lifted out of the sphere of a mere nisi prius decision:" per Lold Chelmsford, C., in Calcraft v. Thompson, 15 W. R. 387.

A New Solution of the Railroad Question.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL for October 23, there is an article headed "A New Solution of the Railroad Question," into which is copied the argument of the editor of the Western Jurist, in favor of the exercise of the right of eminent domain over railroads, and in favor of individuals. The proposal is as follows: "Let any person who desires to run an engine, or a car or a train of cars, call into exercise this power of eminent domain, against or upon the railroad company; and, by the assessment of a jury, subject to revision by the courts, condemn the right of way over the railroad for his engine, car, or train." The plan might succeed as a practical measure, although it seems to me to be full of difficulty. An experienced railroad superintendent, however, would have an opinion on that point so much better than mine, because based upon knowledge and experience, which I have not, that I shall not trouble you with any remarks upon it. But there are some legal difficulties in the way which I imagine would make this private train jump the track without performing the first journey, under this new right of eminent domain.

In the first place, the right of eminent domain can be exercised in favor of the public only, and not of an individual. Secondly, the acquisition of the right could not, by any method known to the law, expand into a power over station agents, telegraph operators, etc., without which the right would not be available. There are other difficulties, but, if these be real, they are as effectual as a battalion.

What is the right of eminent domain, and whence is it derived? It is the natural right which the sovereign has, ex necessitate rei, and for the purpose of maintaining the public welfare and preserving the existence of the state, to take private property for public use. This is, in substance, the definition given by Grotius, Puffendorf, and other writers on public law. Kent states it as "the power in the legislature to take private property for necessary and useful public purposes. Gardner v. Newburgh, 2 Johns. Ch. 165. I confess I do not see how this right can expand so as togive to any individual for his convenience, pleasure or profit, the rights which have heretofore been confined to the community at large, as an aggregate, and for the public welfare only. But, suppose a man should get the right to run a train on a railroad, how can it be run without the assistance of much of the personnel of the road; and how can that aid be condemned? In the old world, soldiers are quartered on families; and it is likely, from the progress we have made in breaking down private, civil and political rights, that we shall come to this by and by; but it does not seem to be very easy to compel a railroad company to entertain its rivals and to lend its officers to them. I cannot but believe that the attempt to compel railroad companies to accept for their services the compensation which the mob of gentlemen who compose some of our legislatures may have generosity enough to award them, will be decided by the court of last resort to be as illegal as it is unjust; and I do not see that this new right of eminent domain is a whit less objectionable in either regard. T. GEORGE.

Denver, Colorado.

REMARKS.—We do not perceive any legal difficulties in the way, such as the above correspondent suggests. It is true that the right of eminent domain can be exercised in favor of the public only, and not merely in favor of individuals; but the scheme proposed involves an exercise of this right in favor of the public, and not in favor of individuals exclusively. When an individual or corporation represents the public, then the right may be exercised in his behalf, for the benefit of the public. The first illustration of the right of eminent domain given by Chancellor Kent, is: "If a common highway be out of repair, a passenger may lawfully go through an adjoining private enclosure." 2 Kent Com. 338. But a "passenger" is but an individual." Nevertheless he represents the whole public, and his rights in such a case are the rights of the state, the nation, the sovereign. Therefore, it was held in Texas in a reported case which we cannot now quote, that a negro slave might lawfully drive his master's wagon over a citizen's land, where the road was impassable. The slave represented the master, and the master represented the public. The land over which all our railroads are built was condemned and taken from private land-owners, and given to private corporations, through the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Upon what ground was this done? The railroad corporation proposed to become a general carrier for the public, and the use for which it desired the land was hence a public use. In other words it represented the public. Precisely in this position will be the private train-owner in the case supposed. He represents the public. He proposes to become a general public carrier; and in this respect, represents the public in a much more enlarged and beneficial sense than a corporation which holds the rights of the public in an iron grasp. Or, if he carries simply for himself, and not for the public, then he represents the public in precisely the same sense as Chancellor Kent's "passenger" represents it upon a common highway. The exercise of the right of eminent domain proposed by the able editor of the Western Jurist, in the article above referred to, means simply that a government which could condemn the property of individuals to make a public way under the exclusive control of a corporation, can now condemn the property of that corporation to make a common highway, under its own control.

The objection that "the acquisition of the right could not, by any method known to the law, expand into a power over station agents, telegraph operators, etc," seems to us equally destitute of force. Whilst it is a familiar principle that the paramount authority of the government extends not only over all the property, but also over the persons and services of its citizens, yet the control of station agents, and telegraph operators would not be an incident of the right of eminent domain, but of the general police power, which in every government must reside somewhere, and which in our government resides either in the states or in federal union, accordingly as it has been apportioned by the federal constitution. If this power resides in the general government (and we are inclined to think it does), it is an incident of its power to regulate commerce between the states. But until exercised by the general government, it clearly may be exercised by the states, and we see no legal difficulties in the way of calling it into full and beneficial use. We imagine that it would not be necessary to "condemn," as our learned correspondent suggests, any of the personnel of the road. All that would be condemned, would be the road, the side-tracks and buildings—the real estate. The private train-owners would furnish their own train-men; and the general superintendent, train-dispatchers, switchmen, etc., would be agents of the government.

Entertaining these views, we ask pardon for suggesting that the train of our learned correspondent has already jumped the track. Every thoughtful person must see how vain and idle is the attempt to limit in advance, by nice legal barriers, the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Had this right been hedged in by legal precedents, our great railroads could never have been built In our government the right has but two limits, and they are of the most general character. 1. The use for which the property of the citizen can alone be taken, must be a public use. 2. It cannot in any event be lawfully taken without just compensation. The right itself is as broad as the public necessities in which it is founded, and as variant as the changing exigencies of society.

Law Schools.

For the last two or three months we have noticed a succession of articles in the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, and also in the Albany Law Journal, in manifest hostility to law schools. This hostility, we are bound to believe, is unconsciously entertained and not intended to be expressed; because the editor of the last named, says, it is an error to suppose "that the discussion means hostility to the law schools, and the editor of the first named, in his issue of the 28 ult., says:

"The opposition is not to law schools, but to too rapid graduation. Or, if it is found impracticable for law schools to lengthen their course of study, then the protest is against admitting their graduates to the bar on the faith of their diplomas, without further examination.

"We do not wish to be understood as attempting to lecture the law schools on this subject, while passing over in silence the conduct of the courts. We have good reason to believe that the conduct of many of the courts in the West and South, with regard to admitting candidates to the bar, has been remiss in the last degree. We are glad to be able to testify that the federal courts at St. Louis, and the circuit court of Saint Louis county, are conspicuous exceptions to this rule. But the painful fact is forced upon us that, as a general thing, the examination by judges, or by committees of the bar, of candidates for admittance to the bar, is a mere sham. We know of instances where a basket of champagne, or even a bottle of whiskey, has secured a favorable report, and where candidates have been admitted who have never read law a week, and who were even ignorant of the names of the leading elementary writers on the law. This state of things, which we believe is not new, but has existed in many quarters for years, is a scandal and a reproach to the legal profession. It inevitably enforces upon men of sense the conclusion that a profession which thus admits Tom, Dick and Harry to its honors, has very little honor, and is unworthy either of the confidence or respect of the public."

"Now, when it is remembered that both of the journals named have been making their war upon law schools on the alleged ground that the term of study required by them, which is practically but the equivalent of a single year, it is too short to qualify a student for the bar, the admission as to the course pursued and the practical results under the old system, which they advocate, are truly very refreshing. And just such results as are above stated, by our esteemeed co-laborer in legal reform, were very often, if not generally realized in the State of New York, when the rule existed there in its greatest length, for which our Albany brother expresses his preference by saying, "the best pre-requisite to admission to the bar is a sufficient term of study."

The idea of a term of study has generally prevailed in this country for the last century, and in Great Britain for the last centuries, and that idea has wrought for us just the results so faithfully portrayed by our cotemporary in the above extract, and such results are the natural and legitimate fruits of the idea underlying the practice. It is essentially unjust and unequal, because one student by reason of previous advantages, superior talent, and greater industry, will accomplish more, when left to himself (as students in law offices are), in one year than others will accomplish in three years. A term of study is not requisite for admission to our colleges, for a certificate to teach, for the right to practice medicine, or to engage in any other business of life. Why, then, establish a term of study as requisite to entering upon the practice of the law? The fact is, that a term of study, and the study of law with a practitioner, have both been fully and effectually tried and found wanting. They are giving away, as they should, to something else, and that something else, which is now on trial, is the law school, and unless this new method is carefully nurtured and guarded, it too may be found wanting.

What we wish to do, is to foster and nourish our law schools, to encourage and aid them, to carefully guard and elevate them so that the fullest advantage may be derived from them. To this end, we would advise every student at law to attend them; we would, as soon as practicable, have their course extended so as to embrace the studies, requiring at least two full years to fairly accomplish them; we would require a thorough and critical public and oral, examination (as well as a written one), occupying days, and made by a committee of recognized and competent lawyers, and not mere practitioners, and that the students should satisfactorily pass, before graduation; we would also, at the earliest practicable day, require a course of study previous to admission to the law schools, and that the standard fixed had been attained, should be demonstrated in an examination by a committee therefor, properly constituted; and we would constantly struggle to elevate this standard as well as the standard of legal attainments. Such a course would surely improve the aggregate of the profession, even if it reduced its number. The objection, sometimes raised to law schools, that a student cannot learn the practice of the law there, is fully met by the fact that they do (or may), there learn the principles of the practice, and that, ordinarily, a sufficient time intervenes between the admission to the bar and the obtaining of business, to enable them to learn by observation in the courts the mere practice. The experience of ages has demonstrated that the place to learn is in the schools—and this demonstrated fact will be found to apply with equal truth and force to the law as to any other science or elementary truth.—[Western Jurist.

Notes and Queries.

We ask the attention of our readers to the following queries. Our engagements have prevented us from giving them any attention:

I. PRACTICE—APPEAL FROM JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—CERTIORARI.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Oct. 28, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—G. brought suit against B. in justice court, and the cause having been adjourned beyond ninety days, B. appeared only for the purpose of moving that the action be dismissed; and on the motion being denied, left; whereupon judgment was had against him. B. then brought a common law writ of certiorari to reverse the the judgment. While the writ was pending, and before hearing, B. appealed the case from justice to circuit court, as provided by statute. Afterwards, the writ was heard and the judgment in justice court affirmed. Appeal is still pending.

Quære.—Does the judgment on the writ prevent the appeal from being heard? Is the case finally disposed of by that judgment? What will be done with the appeal? And finally, does the taking of the appeal waive the defect cited by the writ, so as to make the writ and proceedings under it void? If so, is the judgment on the writ a void judgment also? Would like a reply with authorities through the journal. Yours truly,

A READER OF THE JOURNAL.

II. BANKRUPTCY—POWER TO COMPEL NON-RESIDENT BANKRUPT TO SUBMIT TO EXAMINATION.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Oct. 26, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—The following question is one that has become somewhat interesting in our district, and I submit it to you for an answer in your valuable journal:

A., within the last year, filed his voluntary petition, upon which he was subsequently declared a bankrupt, and an assignee appointed, etc. After the filing of the petition A. removed from the district in which such petition was filed, and has also as since remained away and refused to appear before the register of said district and submit to an examination, for the reason that he is out of the district, and cannot be compelled to appear.

Question.—Is there any way in which he can be compelled to appear before such register—for the purpose of an examination relative to his business, etc., and prior to his filing of such petition? If not, has the court any jurisdiction to compel him to appear before a register, or any person in the district in which he now lives, for the purpose of such examination?

It will be readly seen, that unless the court has power to do one or the other of these things, then the real object of the bankrupt law may be defeated.

An answer to this, I think, will be of some interest to the profession in general. I am very respectfully, W. E. H.

III. PURCHASE OF LEASED PROPERTY.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL., Nov. 7, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A. and B. were partners as coal merchants. They were the owners of two sets of scales and coal sheds, for the handling and disposing of coal shipped to their order. These scales and sheds were constructed, by agreement, upon land belonging to the R. R. Company, and are therefore personal property. A. of the above firm, sold and conveyed to C., by sealed instrument, an undivided one-half of said scales and coal sheds, nothing being said as to the delivery or possession of said property. C. thereupon immediately formed a partnership with B., the remaining partner, for continuing the business of coal merchants. Within a few days after entering into this partnership, C. bought B.'s interest in the above mentioned property and business, and should now have had full control and possession of said property and business, but for one other circumstance. Prior to the purchase made of A., and entirely unknown by C., A. and B. had leased to the firm of S. and S. the above described property, which lease does not expire until six months after the sales made to C. S. and S. have possession of the property, and, of course, will not give it up. Can C. recover in an action of covenant (or in the state of Illinois, in assumpsit), against A., damages for the non-delivery of possession of said property. C. learned of the contract with S. and S. after he purchased of A., but before he bought B.'s interest.

Should like a reply through the JOURNAL. C. D. M.

Book Notices.

LIVES OF THE LORD CHANCELLORS OF ENGLAND. By LORD CAMPBELL. New Edition. Edited by John A. Mallory, of the New York bar. Illustrated. New York: James Cockcroft & Co. For Sale by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, St. Louis.

We have before adverted to this illustrated edition of Lord Campbell's celebrated work as the best edition which has ever appeared in this country. Since our previous notice, Vols. 3, 4 and 5, have been issued. Vol. 3 includes, inter alia, the life of Lord Bacon, and Lord Clarendon, with portraits of each; Vol. 4 gives the life of Lord Jeffreys, and that of the highest model of English judges and statesmen,—Lord Somers, with a portrait, while Vol. 5 concludes the life of Somers, and gives those of Cowper, Macclesfield and King. The remaining volumes will appear in a short time, and we unreservedly recommend this edition to our readers. Every lawyer is a better lawyer by reading these interesting biographies, which trace the history of the English law which is in truth like English and American Institutions, a growth, and it can best be learned by studying it historically.

CAUSES CELEBRES. TRIAL OF QUEEN CAROLINE. Three Vols. New York: James Cockcroft & Co. 1874. For Sale by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, St. Louis.

The famous trial of Queen Caroline is one of the most dramatic, and at the same time, one of the most instructive in English history. It occurred under one of the chancellorships of Lord Eldon, and among the counsel for the government was Gifford, afterwards Lord Gifford, and Master of the Rolls; Copley, afterwards Lord Lyndhurst, Chancellor of England, and the Celebrated Parke, afterwards Lord Wensleydale, and a distinguished judge in the court of Exchequer.

The array of counsel for the Queen was, if possible, yet more eminent. It was headed by Brougham, and included Denman, afterwards Lord Chief Justice of England, Wilde, afterwards Lord Truro and chancellor, and Lushington, afterwards famous for his decisions in the high court of admiralty. The history of this trial will prove quite as interesting to the general as to the professional reader. The latter will quite agree with Lord Campbell, that the "law of evidence has been much enriched by the decisions in the Queen's case," while all intelligent readers cannot fail to be struck with admiration at the skill displayed in the examination of the witnesses by the counsel, and particularly at the intrepid, glowing, indignant eloquence of Brougham and Denman. If we except, possibly, some of the speeches of Erskine, whom we regard as the greatest master of frorensic eloquence that ever spoke the English tongue, the speeches in defence of the Queen undoubtedly may be classed as among the greatest examples of the skill and eloquence of the bar.

This is an elegant edition, printed on tinted paper, is put at a low price, and we warmly commend these volumes to our readers.

LAW OF FIRE INSURANCE. By HENRY FLANDERS. Second Edition. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. 1874. pp. 668.

The profession are quite well acquainted with this work through the first edition. It is confined to Fire Insurance, and this we regard as a merit, for although the different kinds of insurance are in many respects similar, and therefore susceptible of combined treatment, yet the dissimilarity in important particulars, as well as the great accumulation of material, makes a separate and distinct discussion desirable. This work is not so elaborate and full as many. It aims to state succinctly the principles of the cases without going into detail and exhaustive illustration. In this respect it is like Byles on Bills, and it bears about the same relation to some more elaborate works on the same subject as Byles does to Parsons.

The preference of the body of the profession is for the more practical works, which give in the notes the substance of leading cases and illustrations and critical discussions and comparisons of adjudications; and yet it is strictly to the busy practitioner and the tired judge, to see the law on a given point neatly summed up or stated by the author with a mere citation of the cases upon which the text is based, if the author be one in whose ability and carefulness he feels that he can rely. The second edition contains many new cases, and with some omissions, generally of minor consequence, brings the law of Fire Insurance fully down to date.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Legal Intelligencer, for November 6, contains some interesting decisions. The following are by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania: Taney v. Long: The undue influence which would be sufficient to destroy a will must be something more than mere importunate persuasions.

Commonwealth v. Trout: A decree or judgment may only be impeached in a collateral proceeding for fraud or collusion.

Hepburn v. Mans: In covenant, a plaintiff may maintain several actions for different instalments. Attachment of a debt does not prevent the recovery of judgment; it only suspends execution.

Chambersburg Woolen Co. v. Chambersburg Manufacturing, etc. Association: The capital stock of a corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts, and, therefore, a sale, by an insolvent corporation, of its real estate to a stockholder for stock, makes such purchaser liable for its value in cash to the corporation's creditors.

McFerran v. Mont Alto Iron Company: Clear proof of contract of purchase, the quantity of land sold, payment of purchase-money, and long continued possession, meet the requirements of the statute of frauds.

It also publishes a very full opinion of Mr. Justice Strong (with whom McKennan, Circuit Judge, concurred), in the matter of Jay Cooke & Co., bankrupts. The following is the syllabus: After a bankrupt's estate has been placed in the hands of a trustee, under the direction of a committee of creditors, by virtue of the 43d section of the bankrupt act, the court cannot, in the absence of fraud, call a meeting of creditors to control the committee's action.

The Chicago Legal News, for November 7, publishes an interesting decision of Mr. Circuit Judge Drummond, under § 39 of the bankrupt act, as amended. The case is Re Williams and McPheeters. The petition was filed on the 22d of June, the day of the passage of the amendment to the bankrupt law, and one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the creditors were not parties to it. It was afterwards, with the consent of the court, amended, and the required number of creditors became parties to it. Held, that it was competent for the court to permit the amendment to be made, and when made, that it related back to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and gave effect to the action of the court. It was also held that the bankrupt court having jurisdiction of the case, possessed authority to protect the debtor from arrest in a state court. The learned judge said: "The amendment should be reasonably construed, and if possible, so as not to destroy, or even impair, any proceedings which had been already commenced, or which might be commenced in good faith, and in ignorance of the passage of the amendment on that particular day, the 22d of June." A similar question came before Mr. District Judge Withey in Re Burch, 10 N. B. R. 150, and a different view was taken. In that case the petition was filed on the 25th of June, the third day after the passage of the amendatory act, but before the petitioner had been advised of its passage. It was held that the petition could not be amended so as to make the allegations required by the 39th section, as amended, with reference to the number and value of creditors; that those allegations not having been made in the first instance, the court had no jurisdiction, and the petition was accordingly dismissed.

The Legal News shows its enterprise in publishing Tilton v. Beecher, Criminal Court of Brooklyn, N. Y., in which Neilson, J., considers the question whether a defendant in an action of tort may require a bill of particulars, and refuses the application.

It also publishes a Kentucky case, Spratley v. Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co., which discusses the effect of the war on southern policies of life insurance.

The Washington Law Reporter, for October 27, publishes the case of the District of Columbia v. Herlihy, Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, General Term. In this case an information in a criminal case charged the defendant with keeping a tippling house "at house No. 1601 Q. street," in the city of Washington, and, on the trial of the cause before a jury, it was proven by the witnesses for the prosecution that defendant committed the offence at No. 1601 12th street. The attorney for the district then asked permission of the court to amend the information by striking out the house, number and street laid in such information, which was allowed, the defendant excepting. Held, that such amendment could not be made at the trial of the cause; that where a criminal information is required by statute to be under oath, it cannot be amended at the trial of the cause in any manner affecting the charge against the defendant; that the act of assembly, providing that technical or clerical errors may be amended at the trial, extends only to formal or ministerial mistakes.

It also publishes Campbell v. American Popular Life Insurance Company, same court, with the following syllabus: A person obtaining a policy of life insurance may agree that the surgeon-in-chief of the company shall decide whether one of the conditions upon which the policy issued has been complied with, and his decision will be binding.

Where one of the conditions in the policy is that the insurance money is to be paid, if, in the opinion of the surgeon-in-chief of the company, the party insured did not die of intemperance, nor by any disease produced or aggravated by intemperance, it was held that this was a valid condition precedent, and that its performance must be averred or its non-performance accounted for.

If, however, the surgeon is also a stockholder whose dividends are affected by the payment of claims, and the fact of such interest was concealed by the company from the party insuring at the time the policy was made and accepted, it is a sufficient excuse for the non-performance of such condition.

The Washington Law Reporter, for November 3, reports the case of Hoss v. Wilson, Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, with the following syllabus:

The plaintiff entered into a contract by which he agreed to employ the defendants in the prosecution of a number of claims against the United States, which he held as agent for other persons, and he was to have one-third and the defendants two-thirds of the fees. It was then stipulated, "that in the cases of T. J. Coyan, Nicholas Culliton and P. Moran, the fees shall be equally divided between the parties hereto." Held, that as to the cases here specifically mentioned, the agreement was independent, and not affected by the stipulation in relation to other cases.

It is no defence to a bill charging defendants with having collected the claims specified in the agreement, and praying for a discovery and an account, to set up that plaintiff had made false representations at the time of entering into the contract, as to the amount and character of the other claims which he would probably procure, and that he had failed to obtain other cases for the defendants to prosecute.

When a case involves both discovery and account, it is within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

Also the interesting case of Mitchell v. Seitz, same court, expounding the Married Woman's Property Act of the District of Columbia. The syllabus is as follows:

1. Where a married woman acquired title to real estate which was paid for by money belonging to her husband, she cannot hold said property as against his creditors.

2. Where a purchase of real estate is made in the name of a married woman, and there is no proof that she has separate means or funds, and the husband is carrying on a successful business and not paying his debts, the presumption is that the purchase was made by funds which he had furnished.

3. The earnings of a married woman are still the property of the husband notwithstanding the act of Congress permitting married women to obtain and hold property in this district.

The Pittsburgh Legal Journal, for November 4, reports Re Andrews & Jones bankrupts, in which the sum of one hundred dollars was allowed solicitors of involuntary bankrupts as reasonable compensation for preparing their individual and partnership schedules.

It also publishes a report of a charge of Presiding Judge Hampton to a jury, in Atvater v. Wood, which was an action for injuring plaintiff's land, by excavating a sand-pit, so that some of plaintiff's land caved into it, which sand the defendant generously carted off and sold. The case is said to have been affirmed by the supreme court.

The American Law Times Reports, contains a number of interesting decisions. Those which we have not already noticed as appearing in the weekly law periodicals, have the following head-notes:

Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Co. v. Galbreath (to appear in 63 Ill.):

In an action against a railroad company, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, through the carelessness and negligence of defendant's servants and agents in running a train of cars upon their track, it appeared that while, in the night time, the plaintiff was walking on the track in a village, at a place where the same was so used, without objection, by all classes of persons, he was overtaken and struck by an engine without any headlight, running at a high rate of speed, there being no bell rung, or whistle sounded to indicate the approach of the train, and the plaintiff hearing or seeing nothing of it until he was struck. Held, that the negligence of the plaintiff in walking on the track, if it was negligence, was but slight when compared with the gross and criminal negligence of the defendant in so running a "dark train," at a high rate of speed through the village, without signalling its approach.

Merrifield v. City of Worchester (to appear in 110 Mass.):

Digitized by Google

If the water of a stream becomes polluted by the emptying into it of city sewers, so that a riparian proprietor cannot use it in his business, as he has been before accustomed to do, he cannot recover against the city for the pollution, so far as it is attributable to the plan of sewerage adopted by the city; but he can recover for it so far as it is attributable to the improper construction, or unreasonable use of the sewers, or to the negligence or other fault of the city, in the care or management of them.

Murphy v. The Commonwealth (to appear in 24 Grattan):

1. The act of March 30, 1871, Sess. Acts 1870–1871, p. 332, does not give justices of the peace jurisdiction to try a case of felony; and the conviction and punishment of a party by a justice for an assault and battery will not bar a prosecution for wounding with intent to kill, by the same act for which he was punished by the justice.

2. If the accused has been indicted and convicted for a mere assault and battery in the county court having jurisdiction of such offence generally, the conviction will not be a bar to an indictment for a felony, in the perpetration of which the assault and battery was committed.

3. On a trial for an assault with intent to kill, the witness upon whom the assault was alleged to have been made, was asked if he did not tell his wife that the prisoner acted only in his own defence. 1. The answer to the question may tend to criminate himself, and the testimony is inadmissible. 2. It required him to state a communication supposed to have been made by him to his wife, which, if made, was a confidential communication, and which he was not bound to disclose.

4. Where a question is put to a witness which he answers, and which relates to a collateral matter not connected with the subject of the prosecution, his answer to that question is conclusive, and cannot be contradicted.

5. In this case, after the witness was asked the question whether he did not state to his wife that the defendant had acted only in his own defence, and he had answered the question denying that he had done so, the wife of the witness was introduced to prove the statement was made to her. She is not a competent witness to prove it, though at the time it was alleged to have been made, they were living apart from each other, but not divorced.

6. A man is taken to intend that which he does, or which is the natural and necessary consequence of his own act. Therefore, if the prisoner wounded the prosecutor, by the deliberate use of an instrument likely to produce death under the circumstances, the presumption of the law is that he intended the consequences that resulted from said use of said deadly instrument.

7. Malice may be inferred from the deliberate use of a deadly weapon, in the absence of proof to the contrary.

8. Where there are two counts in an indictment for a felony, and there is a general finding by the jury of "guilty," if either count is good, it is sufficient.

Ford v. Fitchburg Railroad Co. (to appear in 110 Mass.):

One employed by a railroad corporation to drive a locomotive engine over its road, may recover damages against the corporation for personal injuries caused by a defect in the engine, which was due to the neglect of the agents of the corporation charged with keeping the engine in proper repair, although the directors and superintendent had no reason to suspect negligence or incompetence on the part of such agents. One employed by a railroad corporation to drive a locomotive engine over its road, is not debarred from recovering damages against the corporation for injuries from an explosion caused by a defect in the boiler of the engine, by the fact that he was acting in intentional violation of the rules of the company, unless the accident was due, in whole or in part, to such violation; nor by the fact that such rules provided that the driver of an engine should be held responsible for the condition of his engine, must be sure that it was in good working order, and must immediately stop, draw his fire, station his signal men, and procure assistance, whenever any defect was detected in an engine that would make it in his judgment unsafe to proceed; nor by the fact that he knew the engine was not in good working order, if he did not know and ought not to have known that it was unsafe.

Hayner v. Smith (to appear in 63 Ill.):

1. Since the act of 1861, in a suit to recover rent under a lease executed by a married woman on her own separate property, it is error to join her husband as plaintiff in the action.

2. Where a lessee is, by his lessor, wrongfully evicted from a portion of the demised premises, he is thereby excused from the payment of any of the rent, although he remains in possession of the remaining portion of the premises to the end of the term.

3. But, to constitute an eviction, there must be more than a mere trespass by the landlord. There must be something of a grave and permanent character done by the landlord with the intention of depriving the tenant of the enjoyment of the premises—the question of eviction or no eviction depending upon the circumstances, and being a matter for the jury to decide.

4. Some acts of interference by the landlord with the tenant's enjoyment of the premises may be mere acts of tresspass, or may amount to an eviction, the question whether they partake of the latter character depending upon the intention with which they are done—if clearly indicating an intention on the landlord's part that the tenant should no longer continue to hold the premises, they would constitute an eviction.

Minturn v. Smith, Circuit Court of the United States, District of California, Sawyer, Circuit Judge, Mr. Justice Field concurring:

1. A general statute authorizes a tax-collector for state and county taxes, to execute a deed upon a tax-sale, and further provides that such deeds shall be prima facie evidence of certain facts recited therein, and conclusive evidence of the regularity of the proceedings in all other respects. A subsequent statute provides that a town tax in a certain town shall be assessed and collected at the same time, and in the same manner, as provided by said general act, and confers upon the town treasurer all the powers exercised by the tax collector of the state and county taxes under the general act, but makes no provision as to the effect of the tax deed executed by the town treasurer. Held, that such deed will not be prima facie evidence of the regularity of the prior proceedings.

2. A tax deed which the statute does not make prima facie evidence of the regularity of the assessment and sale, does not cast a cloud upon the title.

3. An injunction will not be granted to restrain the collection of a tax, when the deed issued upon a sale for taxes would not cloud the title.

The Legal Gazette, for October 30, continues to publish decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. These decisions appear to be but slightly in advance of the current volumes of Wallace's Reports, and are therefore almost destitute of value to the subscribers to those reports. Thus Bartholow v. Bean, published in the present number of the Gazette, was published by us several months ago, and is reported in 18 Wallace, 635, which has been for some time in the hands of the profession. Kitchen v. Rayburn Packet Co. v. Sickels, and Burke v. Miltonburger are the other cases which it prints in this number.

The Legal Gazette, for November 6, publishes Head v. The University, Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873, with the following syllabus:

Where, in a university of learning belonging to the state, and which the state was in the habit of governing through curators appointed by itself (such as the University of Missouri), a person was appointed by the curators a professor and librarian for six years from the date of his appointment, "subject to law," held, that the legislature could vacate his office, appoint new curators, and without fault on the part of the professor assigned, order a new election of a professor to the same professorship, and of a librarian, before the expiration of the six years.

Also Butt v. Ellett, same court, with the following head-notes:

1. Although an instrument which purports to mortgage a crop, the seed of which has not yet been sown, cannot at the time operate as a mortgage of the crop, yet when the seed of the crop intended to be mortgaged, has been sown and the crop grows, a lien attaches.

2. When property which the owner has leased is sold at sheriff's sale, on execution against the owner, the sheriff's deed conveys the reversion and the rent follows as an incident.

3. Accordingly, where a lessee of a cotton plantation, made in January, 1857, in order to secure the rent, mortgaged the crop of that year. Held, that although the seed of that crop had not yet been sown, a purchaser of the land at sheriff's sale, could charge as trustee of it for him, a person to whom the tenant had transferred the crop, after it had grown and was gathered, such purchaser having taken with notice of the landlord's mortgage.

Also Aicardi v. State, with the following syllabus:

Whether the legislature of a state has authority, under the constitution of the state, to pass a particular statute; what is the true interpretation of any statute passed by it for a purpose specified, and what acts will be justified under the statute, are matters which lie exclusively within the determination of the highest court of the state, whose judgment is final.

Also Re Jay Cooke & Co., which we have noticed above in the Legal Intelligencer.

Also Clarke v. Delaware & Hudson Canal Co., Supreme Court of Rhode Island, in which the following points are ruled:

1. A case can be removed from a state court to the United States court, even after a trial has been had and the jury disagreed.

2. The cause should be removed as of the date when the motion for removal was made.

—We learn from a private source which is authentic, that the question of revising the general orders in bankruptcy has been referred by the judges of the supreme court to a committee of members of the court. The question involves much consideration, and it is not likely the committee will report until after New Year; and it is also probable that no final action will be had by the court until next spring.

—ON Thursday, October 15th, the Court of Arbitration, which was authorized by an act of the New York legislature, in April last, was formally opened, at the rooms of the New York Chamber of Commerce. The jurisdiction of this court is limited to the Chamber of Commerce of New York city, any member of that body having the right to call another member before the court by a "summons," who shall be deemed to have consented to the trial of the case unless he files an "objection to jurisdiction." Non-members of the Chamber may bring a case before the court by a "submission." Expenses, except in case of a re-hearing, will be borne by the Chamber as a body. Submission to the court is thus made a voluntary matter, but after going before it parties are to be bound by its action, and there is no appeal, as the act now stands. The idea is to provide a tribunal for a speedy and inexpensive method of deciding disagreements without the necessity of enduring the law's delay; the idea is an old one in Europe, where it has been found very successful in practice, and the results of the experiment here will be watched with great interest.—[The Financier.

—KULLMAN, who attempted to assassinate Bismarck, has been tried, convicted and sentenced. He made a cool and circumstantial confession. He endeavored to kill Bismarck because the latter threatened the Church with ruin. This left the court nothing to do but to determine the question of his criminal accountability. On this point medical testimony was taken. Dr. Reinecke testified that he did not consider Kullman a religious or political fanatic, nor that he possessed a natural predisposition to crime; neither was he a common murderer. His powers of comprehension of right and wrong are unimpared; but on the other hand, he inherited a deficiency of moral strength. His maternal grandfather committed suicide, his mother died deranged, and his father was an habitual drnnkard. These facts, Dr. Reinecke thinks, are calculated to produce in Kullman a want of independence in forming opinions, susceptibility to external impressions, coldness of heart, vanity and tendency to violence. He is therefore of opinion that although Kullman may be considered an accountable being, his nature nevertheless possesses a hereditary morbid disposition calculated to affect his free will. Herr Hubrich, director of a lunatic asylum, deposed that while the prisoner was very deficient in moral sense, yet his free will was so triflingly affected that there was scarcely any ground for mitigation.

Testimony was then taken as to the religious influences to which he had been subjected. The prisoner then related the story of his life. The president of the court summed up the medical testimony to the effect, that at the time of the assassination, as well as at present, Kullman was accountable for his acts to but a limited degree. Kullman was found guilty as charged in the indictment, and sentenced to imprisonment for fourteen years in the house of correction, and ten years' suspension of his civil rights, and to remain under surveillance for life. These statements are given by us as they appear in the telegraphic report. It appears to have been a jury trial. It appears to have been conducted with a dignity and decency that would put to shame many such trials in America and in France. The man was evidently sane, the sentence just and not too severe, considering the nature of the crime. That part of it which places him under surveillance for life seems eminently proper. Such men ought to be watched in every government which cares for the lives of its citizens. But what strikes us most, is the broad range of the evidence which went over the man's whole life—in such striking contrast with the narrow and exclusionary rules adhered to with such bigotry by the courts of the common law.

—THE Albany Law Journal reminds us that William Cullen Bryant, whose eightieth birthday was celebrated on the 3d instant, was once a legal practitioner, and represented the plaintiff in the case of Bloss v. Tobey, 2 Pick. 320. This reminds us that Noah Webster, whose story about the lawyer's bull goring the farmer's ox, called forth some animadversions from the same journal a few months ago, was also a legal practitioner in his younger days, and at one ime a judge. In his story about the bull and the ox, he aptly portrayed human nature, which is the same, whether it develop itself through the character of a lawyer or any other. It may not be out of place to note that General Sherman once tried to practice law, at Leavenworth, Kansas, it is said; but in his first case was so overwhelmed by the low arts and vile rhetoric of a shyster, that he threw up the business in disgust. He probably entertains an opinion of lawyers very like that of the great lexicographer.

—MR. SERGEANT COX recently read a paper before Repression of Crime Section of the Social Science Congress, at Glasgow, in which he argued in favor of cumulative sentences in cases of inveterate criminals. He sums up his views, as follows:

"1. The object of punishment is, first, to deter the offender from repeating the offence, by fear of the consequences; secondly, to deter others from offending by the knowledge of the pain they will incur if they do so.

"2. For this purpose the law should affix to all offences, below a certain high class of crimes, a scale of penalties increasing at a fixed ratio with every repetition of the same offence.

"3. The law should also impose some increase of sentence upon a conviction for any offence of the same nature, as, for instance—in larceny, for any crime in the nature of dishonesty; in assault, for any offense involving violence, and so forth. (This the law has already partially accomplished.)

"4. In all cases there should be vested in the court a large discretion for mitigation of punishment, and here I would suggest whether it would not be desirable to make some change in the present practice of sentences so as to require the judge to say to this effect: 'I now pronounce the sentence of the law, which for your offence is (naming the statutory penalty). But by virtue of the power given to me to mitigate that sentence, for the reasons I now state to you, I reduce your punishment for that offence to,' etc. Much benefit would accrue from such a repeated publication of the punishment attached by the law to offences, and no small advantage would be secured by the judge being thus required to state publicly his reasons for its mitigation.

"5. One of the strongest recommendations for the adoption of a scale of cumulative punishments, is that it precisely apportions the remedy to the disease."

Voluntary Bankruptcy—Vacating Proceedings on Account of Insanity.—In re Alonzo Murphy, 10 N. B. R. No. 1, the following opinion was delivered by Mr. District Judge Trigg: Creditors of Alonzo Murphy file a petition against him, asking his adjudication in involuntary bankruptcy, sometime in the year 1872. The order to show cause was served on him, and, on his default to answer, he was adjudicated a bankrupt, and his property turned over to an assignee. The property in the hands of the assignee has never been distributed among the creditors. Alonzo Murphy now comes in with a petition, supported by affidavits, showing that he was non compos mentis at the time the debts of petitioning creditors were created, as well as at the time of the institution of proceedings, and the adjudication of bankruptcy, and until a very recent period. Under this state of facts, I cannot refuse the application to set the default and subsequent adjudication aside, and to allow Alonzo Murphy to show cause why he should not be adjudicated a bankrupt.

NOTE.—A jury trial was subsequently had, and a verdict of insanity at the time of the adjudication of the lands. It is not pretended that there is found any express reservation in either, or all, of these.

Admiralty—Salvage—Pilotage—Ambiguous Signals.—In The Racer, 30 L. T. N. S. 904, the Admiralty Court of the Cinque Ports decided a very interesting question relative to salvage. It appeared that a signal was made by the Racer; the signal was a Union Jack with a portion of the ensign torn away and hoisted above her topgallant-yard. The Stag sent a boat to the Racer, and one of the crew went on board and helped run her into the nearest port. Sir R. Phillimore, who delivered the opinion, said the signal raised by the Racer was an ambiguous one, and would be construed according to the condition of the vessel when boarded. And on the question whether the service rendered was purely pilotage or partook of the nature of salvage, the judge was of opinion that it was the latter, as the condition of the Racer was such that her master thought it best to put into the nearest port for repairs. For other cases bearing on the subject of ambiguous signals, see The Heding, Spinks, E. C. C., and Adm. 21; The Felix, id., note; The Little Joe, Lush. 88; The Enterprise, 2 Hagg. Adm. STATE EXEMPTIONS AND THE BANKRUPT LAW.—The recent decision of Mr. Chief Justice Waite and Mr. Circuit Judge Bond, in the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, in Re Deckert, holding that the act of Congress of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat., 577), amendatory of the bankrupt law, which declares that the amount of exemptions allowed by the bankrupt act "shall be the amount allowed by the constitution and laws of each state, respectively, as existing in the year 1871," is unconstitutional, because it violates the principle of uniformity required by the constitution, art. 1, § 8, seems to have been opposed to the views of several of the district judges. It affirms Re Dillard, decided in the same court by Mr. Circuit Judge Bond, but denies the principle of Re Jordan, 8 N. B. R. 180, Dick, J.; of Kean v. White, 8 N. B. R. 367, Rives, J.; and of Re Smith, 8 N. B. R. 401, Erskine, J. This last case presents a very full and able discussion of the question, and should be read in connection with Re Deckert, as perhaps the best presentation of the opposing view. In Re Willis A. Jordan, 10 N. B. R. 427 (determined since the publication of Re Deckert), Mr. District Judge Erskine adheres to his former view; and this view is strengthened by Re Beckerford, 1 Dillon, C. C. 45 (1870), in which Mr. Justice Miller and Mr. District Judge Krekel ruled that the fourteenth section of the original act of 1867, which adopted the state exemption laws in force in 1864 as the measure of property to be exempted in proceedings in bankruptcy, was uniform in its operation among the states, and was therefore constitutional.

CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR RAILWAY NEGLIGENCE.—We find the following observations in our able contemporary, the Railroad Gazette:

Punishment for neglect is provided for in the French railroad laws, as well as for malicious causing of accidents, and even for threatening to cause one. Article 19 of the law on railroad police of July 15, 1845, says: "Whoever, through lack of skill, imprudence, inattention, negligence, or disobedience of the laws and regulations, shall have involuntarily caused on a railroad, or in the stations, an accident which shall have occasioned wounds, shall be punished with imprisonment for from eight days to six months, and with a fine of from fifty to a thousand francs. If the accident has caused the death of one or several persons, the imprisonment shall be from six months to five years, and the fine from three hundred to a thousand francs." Article 20 of the same law says: "Every engineman or brakeman who shall have abandoned his post during the running of a train, shall be punished with imprisonment from six months to two years." This is worse than dismissal, which some trainmen think very hard. The first article provides a punishment which seems impossible in this country under existing laws. It will be remembered that the conductor and engineman of the coal train on the Chicago & Alton Railroad who by running contrary to orders caused the terrible Lemont collision, killing about twenty persons and wounding as many more, could not be punished. The conductor was indicted for manslaughter, but, having been out on bail for nearly a year, on coming to trial was found "not guilty," there being of course no shadow of suspicion that he had intended any harm by the act which put his own life in extreme danger. This is a case of which many will feel justified in saying: "They do these things better in France."

The above writer is entirely mistaken when he supposes that drivers of railway trains can negligently kill passengers or co-employees and that "punishment is impossible under existing laws." The law is very old, very well settled, and very familiar to every lawyer, that if one person kills another through negligence in the prosecution of any lawful employment, it is either murder or manslaughter, according to the degree of the negligence involved. Foster Cr. Law, 262-3; 1 Hall P. C., 472-6; 1 East P. C., 262-4; 4 Bla. Com. 192; 2 Whart. Cr. L. 7th Ed., §§ 1002 et seq. These principles have been applied to railroad accidents produced by negligence in several cases, American and English. 2 Whart. Cr. Law, § 1010 a. We do not mention this as a matter of news or even of interest to lawyers, but because it would be a public misfortune if the impression should get out among the drivers of railway trains that they can kill passengers or co-employees through the negligent running of their trains, and yet escape punishment. If the conductor and engineman of the coal train which caused the Lemont disaster were guilty, and yet went unpunished, it was not the fault of the law, but of the manner in which it was administered. There is doubtless need of legislation in some states, making those guilty of negligence or impropriety in running railway trains amenable to punishment where persons are injured through such negligence, but not killed; but when death has resulted, the law is good enough if it is only administered.

Carriers—Loss of Goods on Connecting Line.

The case of The Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Co. v. The Northern Line Packet Co., 7 Chicago Legal News, 34 Supreme Court of Illinois, Walker, J., is an interesting one. One Emanuel Solen delivered to the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company several packages of goods to be shipped to Lee Summit Station, Jackson county, Missouri. One of the packages was lost, and the owner obtained a judgment for the value of the same for $1128, and afterwards compromised for $750. The Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company then brought suit against the Northern Line Packet Company, to whom they had delivered the goods, instead of the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company, by whom the goods were in fact lost. The bill of lading given by the Northern Line Packet Company to the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad Company, contained the ordinary stipulation, "that they will convey the goods without delay from Fulton to Hannibal, and deliver them to the Hannibal & St. Joseph railroad, as consignees, he or they paying freight for the goods." It was held that the action could not be maintained, but that the plaintiffs must resort to the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company, the carrier which neglected its duty.

The main question in the case is discussed by the court as follows:

The question arises whether appellees [the Northern Line Packet Company], by force of the duty devolving on them as common carriers, become liable for the neglect of duty by the other carriers into whose hands the goods would go after leaving theirs, notwithstanding this agreement contained in the bill of lading. In the case Illinois Central Railroad Company v. Franklinburg, 54 Illinois, 88, it was said, that in adopting a rule where goods are lost by one carrier in a line of carriers composed of several, that it was more just to hold the carrier, to whom the goods are delivered by the consignor liable, than to require him to spend time and money in searching for the carrier who produced the loss, and to bring suit for the injury in a distant state; that the intermediate roads should be considered the agents of the road first receiving the goods, as they have facilities not possessed by a consignor of tracing out the losses of property thus shipped; and that all have or can have running connections with each other, and the company first receiving the goods should be liable to the consignor. It is not intimated in that case that the owner or consignor may sue and recover of any carrier through whose hands the goods would have to pass, but the carrier first receiving them or the carrier who has neglected his duty. On the other hand, there is a strong implication that the consignor must sue either the first carrier or the carrier committing the wrong. And we are not willing to carry the rule beyond that extent, and must confine it within that limit. If the remote carriers are the agents, or are to be considered as such, of the carrier first receiving the property for transportation, and the goods are lost or damaged by another in the line, the first carrier having been compelled to adjust the loss, if he sues to recover it back he must proceed against the carrier who has occasioned the loss. He has or can have the means of readily finding where it occurred. Nor can a person, as a general rule, sue any agent of his but the person who has omitted the duty or perpetrated the wrong. He has no election to sue an agent who has performed his entire duty, and have him to sue another agent who is guilty of a failure to perform his duty, and has produced the injury to the principal. From these considerations it follows that appellees are not liable for the loss.

Ante-Nuptial Incontinence and Venereal Disease —Is it Ground for Divorce?

The Monthly Western Jurist (Bloomington, Ill.) for September, contains an interesting and forcibly written article by a writer signing himself W. F. T., under the above head, in which the writer takes ground that this question should be answered in the affirmative, although the law has answered it in the negative. He tells us "the student will be astonished to find the soil of the departments of the law almost totally barren of this question," and that in considering it, "we must be guided more by reason and analogy than by authenties." He then proceeds to argue that when either party is afflicted with a syphilitic disease at the time of the marriage, it should be avoided, (1) on the ground of impotency, (2) on the ground of fraud, and (3) on the ground of cruelty. We are inclined to think, without reference to what the courts may have decided, that a proper view of the marriage relation—of the duty of the marital partners towards each other, and towards the state, would result in the annulment of such a marriage on either of the two grounds first named; but that it might require a more liberal view of what is understood by legal cruelty, to annul it on that ground. But viewing it as a question, not of what the law is, but of what it should be, we should be in favor of annulling such marriages on the higher ground that they are likely to result in the procreation of diseased offsprings, and therefore that it is against public policy to permit them to stand. We therefore quite concur with this writer, when he says:

As to the marriage, there are three parties: the man, the woman, and society. So to the divorce there are the same three—the court sitting to protect society. The court should see that it is reasonable and proper—conducive to the interests of society, to domestic harmony, and the good of the parties. * * * The end of marriage is the procreation and perpetuation of the human race. All must be subservient to this. The state has the right to and must govern these relations, for every one is born into the state without his consent, to become a part of the great civil body. Hence the relation of state to the status of those who thrust offspring upon its mercies and claim its protection. The marriage relation underlies, and is the base of the very existence of the state. The state then, by its laws, has the inherent right to demand purity and integrity in the marriage; to the end that her citizens should not spread foul and contaminating diseases, or thrust upon it, offspring to be shunned as a leper. The state should be the guardian of its own interests. Hence we argue that the state should furnish the power to separate a man and woman, should either desire it, when that union is liable to generate or spread syphilitic disease.

The reader must not, however, expect to find in the article we are considering a legal argument upon the question. The writer is evidently a doctor and not a lawyer. He sometimes cites authors without giving the volume and page, and courts without giving the case, and in one case (in France) he even cites the argument of counsel. Nevertheless his paper is a forcible and valuable argument on a question which deserves the earnest attention of courts and legislatures.

Homicide—Insanity—Mania a Potu.

In Stuart v. The State, Supreme Court of Tennessee, December Term, 1871 (Nashville Com. Reporter, October 22), the defendant had killed his wife under circumstances of great atrocity, during the period of depression that followed a night's debauch. The defence was, that he was laboring under the delusion consequent upon a condition of mania a potu, at the time he did the killing, and was hence not accountable. There was medical testimony at the trial, based on a hypothetical state of facts, tending to show that the prisoner, at the time of the killing, was insane. The circuit judge charged the jury in substance that the law presumed the prisoner, if over fourteen years of age, to be of sound mind, and that the burden was upon him to introduce proof of his insanity, and to create a reasonable and well-founded doubt of his sanity, to entitle him to an acquittal. This instruction was objected to on the ground that it failed to mention and define the particular type of insanity under which the defendant was alleged to have been laboring. The supreme court, however, sustained it as sufficient. McFarland, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The judge, in his charge, does not use the words mania a potu, delerium tremens, or other similar language, but uses the words "unsoundness of mind" or insanity. The jury were instructed, that to relieve the prisoner it was sufficient to show this unsoundness of mind, or create a reasonable doubt of the prisoner's sanity; and this was sufficient whether the disease be permanent or temporary, and whether caused by the voluntary use of ardent spirits or otherwise. We do not think it essential that the judge should have specially defined the various classes or types of insanity. It is the unsoundness of mind that excuses the act; according to the proof, mania a potu is a disease in which the mind is unsound. The language of the charge is comprehensive enough to embrace the particular class of insanity indicated by the proof. It says: "The 'unsoundness of mind' may be temporary, caused by the use of ardent spirits." This is what physicians call mania a potu or delerium tremens, and if the proof made out a case of mania a potu, it made out a case of mental unsoundness. We think, in this, there was no error.

The next objection is that the jury were told that the prisoner must be regarded as of sound mind, if he knew the act was wrong, and knew the consequences—in other words if he knew right from wrong. Upon this question there is to be found a great deal of refinement and subtlety of reasoning. Upon mere abstract theory, there is scarcely to be found any such thing as absolute sanity. It is seldom, if ever, a person can be found not subject to some peculiarity or obliquity of intellect, that may be, according to these abstract principles, classed among some of the almost infinite forms of partial insanity.

But this doctrine is altogether too refined to be applied in the practical administration of the criminal law. We must have some standard more practical in its character. All persons possessing a "sound memory and discretion," in the language of our criminal code, should be held responsible for their criminal acts; and a "sound memory and discretion" must be understood in its practical and not in the abstract sense. Blackstone says, "lunatics or infants are incapable of committing any crime, unless in such cases where they show a consciousness of doing wrong, and, of course, a discretion or discernment between good and evil."

This language is quoted with approval in Dove v. The State, 3 Heiskell, 370. In Rogers v. Com. 7 Metcalf, 500, Chief Justice Shaw said: "A man is not to be excused from responsibility if he has capacity and reason sufficient to enable him to distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular act he is then doing, a knowledge and consciousness that the act he is doing is wrong and criminal and will subject him to punishment. In order to be responsible, he must have sufficient power and memory to recollect the relation in which he stands to others, and in which others stand to him; that the act he is doing is contrary to the plainest dictates of justice and right, injurious to others, and a violation of the dictates of duty. On the contrary, although he may be laboring under partial insanity, if he still understands the nature and character of his act and its consequences, if he has knowledge that it is wrong and criminal, and a mental power sufficient to apply that knowledge to his own case, and to know that if he does the act, he will do wrong and receive punishment—such partial insanity is not sufficient to exempt him from responsibility for ctiminal acts." "If then" (he continues, referring to the case then before him), "it is proved to the satisfaction of the jury that the mind of the accused was in a diseased and unsound state, the question will be whether the disease existed to so high a degree that, for the time being, it overwhelmed the reason, conscience and judgment, and whether the prisoner committing the homicide acted from an irresistible and uncontrolable impulse; if so, then it was not the act of a voluntary agent, but the involuntary act of the body, without the concurrence of the mind directing it."

We quote this language in full, both because it is a clear and forcible statement of a sound rule, and also because it is the authority mainly relied on by the prisoner's counsel. The circuit judge, in the present case, was not so full and elaborate in his statement, but his language is very comprehensive.

It will be seen from the opinion of Judge Shaw above quoted, that the substance and essence of the rule he lays down is, that the accused must have capacity to enable him to distinguish between right and wrong in regard to the particular act, a "consciousness that he was doing wrong, and that he would be punished for it." Here the circuit judge said, in substance, the accused must know that the act was wrong—that is, he must know and be conscious that this particular act was wrong; further, that he must know the consequences. One of the consequences was his punishment. So the language of the judge, though very brief, is comprehensive, and we think as well adapted to the comprehension and understanding of a jury as a more elaborate statement would have been. The facts in proof upon the part of the defence do not tend to establish that the prisoner was laboring under any particular delusion, but simply that he was laboring under mania a potu or delirium tremens.

Bankrupt Act—Winding up Estate by a Committee—Creditors and Trustees.

In Re JAY COOKE & CO.

United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

1. Power of Court to Order Meeting of Creditors after Estate has been Placed in the Hands of a Committee.—A committee of the creditors of a bankrupt having been choosen under the provisions of section forty-third of the bankrupt act, and also a trustee appointed by them, and this action having been confirmed by the district court; Held, that there is no longer any power in that court to order a meeting of creditor for the purposes mentioned in sections twenty-seven and twenty-eight of the act, and that such meeting, if called, would have no authority to resolve and direct as contemplated in those sections.

2. Control of Court over Committee.—If the committee of creditors exercise their discretion mala fide, they may be controlled by the court, but in the absence of fraud, their direction to the trustee must be conclusive.

Opinion of the court by Mr. Justice STRONG, delivered October 29th, 1874. MCKENNEN, Cir. J., concurring.

This is an application made by the trustee and committee chosen and appointed under the forty-third section of the bankrupt act, as well as by some of the creditors of the bankrupts, for a review of an order of the district court directing a second meeting of creditors for the purposes stated in the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth sections of the act.

Several objections have been made to the order, only one of which do we propose now to notice. It is, that three-fourths in value of the creditors whose claims have been proved, having determined that the estate shall be wound up in the manner prescribed by the forty-third section, and their resolution having been confirmed by the district court, there is no longer any power in that court to order a meeting of creditors for the purposes mentioned in the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth sections of the bankrupt act, and that such meeting, if called, would have no authority to resolve and direct as contemplated in those sections.

The bankrupt act of 1867 has very plainly provided two very different systems for winding up, settling, and distributing the estates of bankrupts. The first, and the ordinary one, is that presented by the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth sections, applicable to all cases when the greater part of the creditors in number or in value, who have proved their debts, at their first meeting choose an assignee or assignees, or where the district judge or the register appoints one or more assignees. In such cases the twenty-seventh section requires that a general meeting of the creditors be called at the expiration of three months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or earlier if the court so direct, and requires the assignee to report to the meeting, as well as to the court, an account of his receipts and payments. The assignee is also required to submit to the meeting the schedule of the bankrupts, creditors, and property as amended, and a statement of the whole estate of the bankrupts as then ascertained, of the property recovered and of the property outstanding, specifying the cause of its being outstanding, also what debts or claims are yet undetermined, and stating what sum remains in his hands. The section further enacts, that at such meeting the majority in value of the creditors present shall determine whether any and what part of the proceeds of the estate, after certain deductions, shall be divided among the creditors, with a proviso, that unless at least one-half in value of the creditors shall attend such meeting, either in person or by attorney, it shall be the duty of the assignee so to determine, and in case a dividend is ordered, the assignee is required to pay it under the direction of the court.

By the twenty-eighth section provision is made for a second and third meeting of the creditors, with like powers, and it is enacted, that at the third meeting called by the court, a final dividend shall be declared, unless an action at law or suit in equity be pending, or unless some other estate or effects of the debtor afterwards come to the hands of the assignee, in which case the assignee shall, as soon as may be, convert such estate or effects into money, and within two months after the same shall be so converted, it is required to be divided in manner aforesaid.

It is further directed, that after the third meeting of the creditors no further meeting shall be called, unless ordered by the court; and it is enacted that if at any time there shall be in the hands of the assignee any outstanding debts or other property due or belonging to the estate, which cannot be collected and received by the assignee without unreasonable or inconvenient delay or expense, the assignee may, under the direction of the court, sell and assign such debts or other property in such manner as the court shall order.

Thus it appears that under these provisions very large powers over the winding up, settlement, and distribution of a bankrupt's estate are given to the district court and to a majority in value of the creditors who may be present at a general meeting, or, in case a majority in value are not present at the meeting, to the assignee.

But the forty-third section of the act prescribed another system, the obvious purposes of which were to arrest the ordinary mode of proceeding to wind up, settle, and distribute a bankrupt's estates, to suspend some of the powers conferred upon the district court, and to confer upon representatives of the creditors authority not to be exercised by the general body. The system was extraordinary. It was borrowed from a system which has previously existed in Scotland and in England, which had for its object the withdrawal of the bankrupt's estate from the courts in certain cases, and placing its administration in the charge of the bankrupt himself, or in that of the chosen representative of the creditors.

An examination of the provisions of that section shows very clearly that such was its object, and that the powers conferred thereby are inconsistent with the continued existence of the powers given by the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth sections. It is entitled "of superseding the bankrupt proceedings by arrangement." It is true proceedings under it are declared to be proceedings in bankruptcy, but the ordinary proceedings are superseded by it, and a different system is substituted.

It enacts that "if at the first meeting of creditors, or at any meeting of creditors, to be specially called for that purpose, and of which previous notice shall have been given for such length of time and in such manner as the court may direct, three-fourths in value of the creditors whose claims have been proved, shall determine and resolve that it is for the interest of the general body of creditors that the estate of the bankrupt should be wound up and settled, and distribution made among the creditors by trustees, under the inspection and direction of a committee of the creditors, it shall be lawful for the creditors to certify and report such resolutions to the court, and to nominate one or more trustees to take and hold and distribute the estate under the direction of such committee. If it shall appear to the court, after hearing the bankrupt and such creditors as may desire to be heard, that the resolution was duly passed, and that the interest of the creditors will be promoted thereby, it shall confirm the same; and upon the execution and filing by or on behalf of three-fourths in value of all the creditors whose claims have been proved, of a consent that the estate be wound up and settled by said trustees according to the terms of such resolution, the bankrupt, or his assignee, if one has been appointed, is required to convey all the property and estate of the bankrupt to the trustee nominated, who thenceforth shall hold it with all the powers and rights which the bankrupt would have had if no proceedings in bankruptcy had been taken, or as the assignee would have had were no such resolution passed, and with all the rights and powers of assignees in bankruptcy.

The section also declares that the consent of the three-fourths in value of all the creditors whose claims have been proved, when filed, and the proceedings thereunder, shall be as binding in all respects on any creditor whose debt is provable, who has not signed the same, as if he had signed it, and on any creditor whose debt, if provable, is not proved as if he had proved it, and the trustee is directed to proceed to wind up and settle the estate under the direction and inspection of such committee of the creditors. Still further, it is enacted, that the bankrupt shall have the like right to apply for and obtain a discharge after the passage of such resolution and the appointment of such trustee, as if such resolution had not been passed, and as if all the proceedings had continued in the manner provided in the sections of the act proceeding the forty-third.

This last provision, if it were the only one, would leave no doubt in our minds that the manner of winding up, settling, and distributing the estate was intended to be different from that contemplated by the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth sections of the act. And if this is not so, the forty-third section has accomplished no practical results.

If, when three-fourths in value of the creditors who have proved their debts, have resolved that the estate shall be wound up, settled, and distributed under the direction, not of the court, or the general body of the creditors, but of a committee chosen by them, and their resolution has been confirmed by the court, and when consent to such an administration has been filed, either the court, or a general meeting of the creditors, can control the discretion thus vested in the committee; if a general meeting of creditors composed of one-half in value may determine what part of the estate shall be divided, and when divided shall be made, how does the manner of administering the estate differ in substance from the ordinary manner prescribed in the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth sections? What becomes of the power of the committee to direct the settlement and distribution? Moreover, it is worthy of observation that three-fourths in value of the creditors are required for the adoption of the resolution, and only one-half in value are required by the twenty-seventh section to constitute a creditor's meeting compent to exercise the powers described in that section. May a majority of the creditors in value, present at such a meeting, annul or override the action of the trustee and committee chosen by three-fourths? If so, how can it be said that the creditors who did not sign the consent that the estate should be wound up, settled, and distributed according to the terms of the resolution adopted by three-fourths and confirmed by the court, are bound by the consent and proceedings thereunder, as the statute declares they shall be?

The question when a dividend shall be made, and what portion of the estate in the trustee's hands shall be divided at any particular time, as well as what sums shall be retained to provide for all undetermined claims not proved, other expenses and contingencies, are questions relating directly to the settlement and distribution of the estate. By directing that over the settlement and distribution the creditor's committee shall have the direction, the statute, in our opinion, has withdrawn control over them from every other power, and to that extent has superseded the ordinary proceedings in bankruptcy. And this, we think, was not without reason. The ordinary proceedings are intended to be summary. It is intended by them to conclude the settlement and distribution with the utmost dispatch. Thus the twenty-eighth section requires a second meeting of creditors to be called at the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or earlier, and at a third meeting, when a final dividend is to be declared, unless an action at law or a suit in equity be pending, or other estate come to the hands of the assignee, in which case he is required to convert it into money, as soon as may be, and within two months after such conversion the money is directed to be divided. And it is provided that if at any time there shall be in the hands of the assignee any outstanding debts or other property which cannot be collected and received by him without unreasonable delay or expense, he may sell such debts or property under the direction of the court. It was such hurried settlement of the estate that was regarded as prejudicial in some cases to the interests of the creditors.

For this reason, both in the Scotch and English law, provision was made for administering bankrupt estates in some cases by the creditors themselves, or by the bankrupt under their direction. And for the same reason the forty-third section of our act was enacted, by which the power to direct was given to certain representatives of the creditors; that is, to a committee chosen by them.

No doubt if that committee exercise their discretion mala fide they may be controlled, but in the absence of fraud their direction to the trustee must be conclusive. Certainly the discretion vested in them cannot be controlled by any meeting of the creditors called after their appointment.

Holding such opinions, we feel constrained to reverse the order of the district court, which directed a second meeting of the creditors of the bankrupts for the purposes mentioned in the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth sections of the bankrupt act.

The order of the district court is REVERSED.

Donation of Property to Secure Location of Railroad.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY v. THOMAS C. DURANT.

United States Circuit Court, District of Nebraska, October Term, 1874.

Before Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Circuit Judge.

The acting president and active manager of a railroad company, by an oppressive exercise of his powers, procured donations of property to be made to him in trust for the railroad company: Held, that his action was illegal, and that it affected the company, and that the effect was that he held the property in trust for the donors and not the company.

In Equity: on final hearing. The case made by complainant, in its bill, is substantially this: That in the month of November, 1863, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, having been incorporated and organized, and being about to commence the construction of its road, and having already commenced surveys in Nebraska, at or in the vicinity of Omaha, for the purpose of ascertaining the best point for the location of its eastern terminus, and the most practicable route thence westward, certain citizens of Omaha proposed to Peter A. Dey, the engineer in charge of sale surveys, to convey to T. C. Durant—at the date of such proposal the president and acting manager of the corporation—for its use, certain tracts of land and certain lots therein described. "Said conveyance to be made conditional upon the location of the said eastern terminus within one and a quarter miles of Farnam street, thence running west from said point towards the Platte valley;" that such proposal was accepted, and the conditions performed, and that, after the performance thereof, the several parties being satisfied therewith, and being willing to convey according to their agreement, offered to make such conveyances, and such conveyances were accordingly made; but, by the express direction of Durant, his name was inserted therein as grantee and "trustee," and the said conveyances recited the receipt of the consideration thereof in full, as being "in consideration of the location of the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad at Omaha, within one and a quarter miles of Farnam street, thence running west from said point to the Platte valley;" that it was the intention of the donors to convey in trust, and that Durant took said lands and lots in trust for the corporation, it having furnished the consideration therefor, and still so holds the same, but has refused, upon request, to convey to the rightful owner.

The theory of the bill is, that the lots and lands thus conveyed to Durant as "trustee," were so conveyed in trust for the complainant, and the prayer of bill is that Durant be compelled to execute the trust and convey the property to the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

The conveyances run to "Thomas C. Durant, trustee," but for whom or what he is thus trustee is not stated in the instruments, and the lots and lands do not, in most instances, adjoin the company's road, and are not necessary for its use and operation.

The substance of the answer is, that the corporation did not make the surveys for, or fix the location of the eastern terminus or westward route of the road, but that the surveys were made at Durant's individual expense, and under his individual management and direction; that the proposed donation was intended to be made to him individually, in order to secure his influence with the president and with the corporation in establishing the terminus and route westward; that, while it is true that the word "trustee" was inserted in said deeds, solely at his own instance, it was so inserted to declare a trust in favor of the grantors, in case of non-performance of the conditions of the agreement; that a portion of the lands so conveyed to him he has conveyed to the corporation, because they were necessary to its use, but that the residue he still holds; that the sole consideration of said conveyances was the location of the eastern terminus within one and a quarter miles of Farnam street, and the approval of the route westward by the president, in whom alone was vested the power to fix the terminus of or locate the route; that the condition of the contract was never complied with, and that therefore there has been a reversion to the grantors, for whom he holds, and who should be made parties to the suit, but are not.

The lots and tracts of land in controversy are numerous and of great value.

A. J. Poppleton & E. Wakely, for the complainant. J. M. Woolworth, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—The cause is before the court on final hearing. I do not purpose to refer to the voluminous proofs in detail, but to give the conclusion reached and briefly the grounds of it. The conveyances were made to the defendant as "trustee." As the instruments were drawn in this form at the defendant's suggestion, and as no mistake or accident in framing them is claimed, it is plain that he does not hold the property for himself in his own right. The deeds estop him to set up such a claim, and the proofs, aliunde, show that no consideration for the conveyances moved from or were furnished by him individually.

An attempt was made in the proofs to show that the property was demanded and received by him to reimburse him for the expenses of surveys prior to the completed organization of the company, but this attempt failed. It clearly appears that these expenses were made good to the defendant by the company. It is indisputable, then, that the defendant holds the property in trust, and the only question now to be decided is whether he holds it for the complainant by such a trust that it can enforce. As between himself and the railroad company, of which at the date of the transactions in question the defendant was the acting president and active manager, there is no doubt, upon the proofs, that this property was taken by him in trust for it.

The exact point upon which the cause hinges, is whether the company's right to this property is such that a court of equity will, at its instance, enforce the trust by decreeing the defendant to convey the property to it.

The history of the transaction shows that the property was unfairly obtained by the defendant acting for the company—obtained under circumstances which a court of equity cannot sanction.

The subscription paper is dated November 23d, 1863, and in it the subscribers "agree to convey to T. C. Durant the lots and lands severally described over their respective signatures, for the purpose of securing the location of the eastern terminus of the Pacific road at Omaha City; said conveyances had to be made conditional upon the location of said terminus within one and one-quarter miles of Farnam street, thence running west from said point toward the Platte valley, and to provide that in case of the failure of such location said lots and lands are to revert to and become re-invested in the several grantors."

The act of July 1, 1862 (sec. 14), authorized the president to fix the terminus, and the same had been fixed by him on the 17th day of November, 1863, and his action was fully known when the subscription paper of the 23d day of that month was drawn and circulated. After this paper had been subscribed, another executive order, on March 7, 1864, was made, fixing the eastern terminus on the western boundary of the state of Iowa, opposite section ten of the township in which Omaha is situate. From Farnam street to the nearest part of section ten is a mile and three-quarters. The subscribers to the agreement stipulated for a location of the eastern terminus within one mile and a quarter of that street. When all of the deeds were made to the defendant as trustee, the legal terminus as thus fixed was known to everybody, but the business terminus, that is, the actual terminus, had been fixed by the company within about a half mile of Farnam street. The deeds to the defendant as trustee, none of which are dated earlier than December, 1864, recite that they are made "in consideration of the location of the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad Company at Omaha, within one and a quarter miles of Farnam street, thence running west from said point to the Platte Valley," and contain no clause as to reverter. It thus appears, with reasonable certainty, that all parties had in view the securing of the actual or business terminus, and not merely the legal terminus. The other matter to be secured, was that the road should run westwardly from Omaha, that is, not to a rival place—Florence on the north, or Bellevue on the south, so as to leave "Omaha on a switch," as one of the witnesses phrases it, and although the route of the road was somewhat changed, it was not changed in the interest of either of those places, or to the detriment of Omaha.

Assuming, though not deciding, that the company has the capacity in law to acquire and take property like that in question, not on line of its road nor shown to be necessary for its operations, I should be of the opinion, that if the subscriptions under the contract of November 23d, 1863, were fairly obtained for a lawful purpose, the defendant would be bound to convey the property to the company.

And in this view the whole case lies within the enquiry, was the property fairly or lawfully obtained? In my judgment it was not. There is no satisfactory evidence that this property was demanded by the company, or by Mr. Durant, acting for it, to reimburse it for the additional expense which a terminus at Omaha, instead of Bellevue or Florence, would involve. Besides, after March 7, 1864, it was impossible for the company, if acting in good faith, not to construct and operate its road to Omaha, and it was after this date that all of the deeds to the defendant were made. Whether an agreement to donate lands in consideration of the location of the depot or business terminus of a railroad can be supported in law, we need not enquire. See Fuller v. Dame, 18 Pick. 472; Pacific Railroad Company v. Seely, 45 Mo. 212. I am not prepared to say, that if a company has by law a discretion to adopt its own line and to go to any point its interest might suggest, and it is induced by offers of pecuniary advantages to adopt a more expensive line to another terminus, that such a transaction would necessarily be against public policy, or fall within the principles of the cases above cited. The facts of this cause present no such question, and I do not enter upon its consideration, or give any opinion concerning it.

How these subscriptions were obtained, appears from the testimony; and they seem to have been extorted from the subscribers by reason of the powers which the law had conferred upon the company to be exercised for the public good and not oppressively. The origin of the demand upon the people of Omaha clearly appears from the testimony of Mr. Dey, the confidential employee of Mr. Durant, and subsequently of the company, and who is a gentleman of high character. He testified that "the demand for these lands came from Mr. Durant." Mr. Dey thereupon caused Mr. Durant's demand to be communicated to leading citizens of Omaha. He says: "I did not circulate the paper [of November 23], but was in constant communication with those that did circulate it, and made many suggestions to them with the view to aid them in getting the subscriptions filled out." He is asked "for what purpose the lots and land were to be applied," etc., and his answer is: "The demand for those lands came from me, and the purpose avowed was to influence parties that might be of service to the road and of service in making Omaha the terminal point. Durant said he must have the deeds made to himself as trustee, that he might dispose of the lands without being answerable to any party, and that I stated to Mr. Aug. Kountz (an active citizen in circulating the papers of November 23, 1863) and other parties who were instrumental in procuring the donations." Again Mr. Dey testifies, "I wish to be understood as saying that one of the reasons avowed (why the citizens must give property) was that their donation could be used for that purpose," i. e., "to influence parties who might be of service in making Omaha the terminal point. I avowed that the parties controlling this matter [to-wit, Mr. Durant] had the power to procure such donations of lands as they wanted at the terminus of the road, and they expected to use it, and that I conceived it to be the policy of Omaha to donate what was asked of them. Mr. Durant at that time controlled the whole matter." Mr. Durant was absent and Mr. Dey was his representative. Public meetings were held, and the citizens given to understand that they must donate lots and lands liberally, or else Bellevue or Florence might secure the prize of the terminus; and when the subscriptions were made it is evident that it was done out of fear that Mr. Durant would, or might, otherwise use his power against Omaha, and that these donations (which one subscriber considered a species of "black-mail," another as a "corruption fund") would have the effect to conciliate his favor and secure his influence.

If Mr. Durant intended to use this property to corrupt the official action of others, it was obtained for an unlawful purpose. If he demanded the property not for this purpose, but because he had the power and intended to exercise it, his action is oppressive and cannot be permitted to stand. And as the company in this suit seeks the fruits of Mr. Durant's acts, they are affected through him with the vice of Mr. Durant's conduct.

My judgment is that the subscriptions to the paper of November 23, 1863, pursuant to which the conveyances, were subsequently executed to the defendant, as trustee, were secured by an illegal and oppressive exercise and use of the powers which belonged to the defendant's position as the acting president and active, and at that time almost the sole manager of the company, and consequently a court of equity will hold the defendant as trustee for the donors, although he may have intended to take the lands and lots as trustee for the company. Accordingly a decree will be entered dismissing the bill, except as to the tracts coveyed to him by Enos Lowe, and which he admits in his answer to be held by him in trust for the complainant. DECREE ACCORDINGLY.

Compulsory Bankruptcy—Verification of Petition.

IN THE MATTER OF ROSENFIELDS, ALLEGED BANKRUPT.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Michigan, October 19, 1871.

1. Verification.—A verification of a petition for adjudication is such only as to persons named in the body of it; and is not such as to a person whose name is omitted, although signed by him.

2. ——. By Agent.—Proof of agency, and of express authority, to do the particular acts of signing and verifying the petition by the agent's own oath or otherwise, is essential to the issuing of an order to show cause.

3. ——. ——. Supplementary Affidavits as to Agent's Authority.—In a case free from other difficulties, supplementary proof may, in the discretion of the court, be received, nunc pro tunc, to establish the authority of the agent to sign and verify the petition.

4. One of Several Petitioning Creditors Repudiating the Proceedings.—A creditor voluntarily joining with others in a petition for adjudication to make up the requisite number and amount, cannot afterwards defeat the proceedings by withdrawing his consent. But when the name of a creditor has been joined with others for such purposes, without his knowledge or consent, he may repudiate the proceedings; and if he does so, the petition will be dismissed as to him.

5. Jurisdiction.—Under the act of June 22, 1874, the allegation in a petition for adjudication, as to number and amount, is an allegation of a jurisdictional fact; and such allegation as to a certain number and amount, is not an allegation as to a less number and amount.

6. ——. Amendments.—Amendments can be allowed only where the court has jurisdiction, and it has none of a petition for adjudication which does not contain a clear, explicit and consistent allegation as to the proportionate number of creditors petitioning, and amount of debts represented by them.

7. Deposition of Acts of Bankruptcy.—The deposition of acts of bankruptcy, in order to authorize the making of an order to show cause, must be such as constitutes legal testimony,

On motion to vacate the order to show cause.

Mr. Don M. Dickinson, respondent's solicitor, for the motion; Messrs. Pond & Brown, opposed.

LONGYEAR, J.—The petition purports to be by twenty creditors in number, all non-residents of the district, and it contains an allegation that the petitioners constitute more than one-fourth in number of the creditors, and that they represent one-third of the entire indebtedness of the alleged bankrupts.

Three of the petitioners purport to sign the petition, each by a member of their respective firms; the others all purport to sign by agent—one by A. E. Stevens, eleven by Max Lilienthal and five by Albert Austin. The verification purports to be by and on behalf of all the petitioners, but the name of Aaron Teller, who signed the petition on behalf of Teller Bros., as a member of the firm, although appended to the verification, is not named in the body of it as one of the persons to whom the oath was administered. There was, therefore, no verification as to Teller Brothers, and as that firm constituted one of the first five signers, the petition was not sufficiently verified as required by section 39, as amended by the act of June 22, 1874.

The persons who signed and verified the petition as agents, produced no proof of their agency, or of any authority whatever in the premises, by their own oaths, or otherwise; and the order to show cause was issued in the entire absence of any such proof. This court has always required strict proof of agency, and of express authority, to do the particular act of signing and verifying the petition. I believe this has been the uniform practice in all the bankruptcy courts. In this court such proof has been allowed to be made by the oath of the agent or attorney so signing and verifying; but it has always been held essential to the issuing of the order to show cause. The act of June 22, 1874, has wrought no change in that respect. Therefore, at the time the order to show cause issued, the petition was not duly verified by any of the petitioning creditors, except the two on whose behalf a member of the firm signed and verified.

Pending the consideration of the motion, the solicitors for the petitioning creditors produced, and asked leave to file, nunc pro tunc, as supplemental to the verification of the petition by the three agents, their respective affidavits, as proof of their authority in the premises at the time of signing and verifying. The solicitor for the respondents objected, and at the same time produced and asked leave to file the affidavit of David Hirsch, of the firm of D. Hirsch & Co., one of the firms named in the petition as petitioning creditors, and whose name is signed to the petition by Max Lilienthal, as their agent, and on whose behalf said Lilienthal purports to verify the petition, absolutely and unqualifiedly denying that the firm of D. Hirsch & Co. had authorized said Lilienthal, or any other person, so to use the name of the firm; and that the same was done without their knowledge or consent.

I entertain no doubt that the court may, in its discretion, receive supplementary affidavits in support of the order to show cause, when they tend to prove the authority of the agents at the time they signed and verified the petition, and that the court would do so in a case free from other difficulties. But in the present case there are other difficulties, and such as seem to the court insurmountable. In the first place there is the lack of any verification at all, by or on behalf of the petitioning creditors, Teller Brothers, one of the first five signers, as already noticed. Besides this, I find, on examination of the papers, that there was an entire lack of proof of debt on the part of two of the petitioning creditors, viz.: D. Hirsch & Co. and James M. Bissell. There is a proof of debt in favor of Josiah M. Bissell, but none of James M. Bissell, and Josiah M. Bissell is not a petitioning creditor.

On the authority of the decision of this court in re Simmons (10 N. B. R. 254; 1 Cent. Law Jour. 440), it would be competent to allow the petition to stand over, and the verification on the part of Teller Brothers and the lacking proofs of debt to be supplied, and a new order to show cause to issue. This court holds such a course always competent where the petition itself is free from essential or radical defects. But in the light of the affidavit of David Hirsch, before referred to, unfortunately, perhaps, for the other petitioning creditors, such is not the case here.

When a creditor has once joined with others in a petition for adjudication in order to make up the requisite number and amount, it is, of course, not competent for him to defeat the proceedings by afterwards withdrawing his consent. But such is not the case here. In the present case D. Hirsch & Co. did not join with the others, and of course the proof of debt, etc., as to them, cannot be supplied. They never became petitioning creditors in any sense, and the petition stands as one by twenty creditors, when only nineteen actually joined in it. It is true Max Lilienthal, who signed and verified the petition, as agent for D. Hirsch & Co., swears in his supplemental affidavit that he was anthorized by them to do so, but the affidavit of the creditor himself is of the greater weight, especially where, as in this case, the swearing by the agent, all through, seems to have been done in a careless, loose and unsatisfactory manner.

Clearly, the petition must be dismissed as to D. Hirsch & Co., and if permitted to stand at all, it must be on the petition of the remaining nineteen. But can it, as such, be permitted to stand? The allegation that the petitioning creditors, and the debts represented by them, constitute one-fourth in number and one-third in amount, is an allegation of an essential jurisdictional fact; and an allegation of that fact as to twenty is to not an allegation of it as to any less number. The requirement of the act is, that the petition shall be "of one or more of the creditors, who shall constitute one-fourth thereof at least in number, and the aggregate of whose debts provable under this act amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable." The allegations of the petitioners are, "and that aggregate of your petition [ers'] demands, as they are informed and believe, constitute one-third of the debts so provable," etc., "and on information and belief that your petitioners constitute more than one-fourth of all the creditors," etc. It may be said, inasmuch as the allegation is that the twenty constitute more than one-fourth in number, nineteen must constitute at least one-fourth. Whether or not the court would indulge in any such speculation to sustain the petition in any case, is unnecessary to determine in the present case, because in order to sustain the petition it must be extended to both amount and number, and that cannot be done in view of the working of the petition as to the amount. The courts have gone to the utmost limit of liberality in accepting the allegation as to number and amount on information and belief merely, and in not requiring any proof to sustain the allegation as a prerequisite to an order to show cause, and instead of extending that limit, a reasonable strictness within it must be required. No amendment in this regard can be allowed; because, in order to allow amendments, the court must have jurisdiction, and there is none without a clear, explicit and consistent allegation as to the proportionate number of creditors petitioning and amount of debts represented by them.

The deposition of acts of bankruptcy was also criticised by respondent's counsel as being loose and vague in its statements of facts, and as dealing largely in conclusions and hearsay. On a perusal of it, I am satisfied the criticisms of counsel are not entirely without foundation; but in view of the conclusion already arrived at, it is unnecessary to determine whether or not it was sufficient. The deposition of acts of bankruptcy must be such as constitutes legal testimony; its statements must be of facts, and not the mere conclusions of the witness; and, as a general rule they must be of the witness' own knowledge, and not mere hearsay; and they must be stated with such clearness as to leave no doubt as to their meaning.

The disposition which the court feels compelled to make of the petition, makes it necessary also to grant the motion of respondents to quash the provisional warrant, which is done, without further remark upon the merits of that motion, than that the showing upon which the warrant was allowed is obnoxious to the same infirmities hinted at as to all the proceedings in the matter.

It results that the petition and all orders, processes and proceedings thereunder, must be dismissed, vacated and altogether held for naught; that the respondents be discharged from arrest, and their bail from liability; and the property, books and effects seized by the marshal, under the provisional warrant, must be delivered up; but without prejudice to new proceedings.

Taxation of National Bank Shares.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK v. DOUGLAS COUNTY.

United States District Court, District of Nebraska, November Term, 1874.

Before Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Circuit Judge.

Under the legislation of Nebraska, shares in National Banks may be taxed, and the tax enforced by distraint against the property of the bank.

J. M. Woolworth, for the plaintiff; J. C. Cowin and J. M. Thurston, for defendant.

Digitized by Google

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—This is a bill by the First National Bank of Omaha to restrain the collection of a tax assessed and levied under the revenue laws of the state, for the year 1873, upon the shares of the shareholders in the bank, and which tax, it is alleged, the collector is about to collect by entering the banking-house of the plaintiff and seizing its property.

The bill avers that the capital of the plaintiff is $200,000, and that this amount is wholly invested in bonds, issued by the United States; the stock is divided into shares of $100 each, and are valued for taxation at that sum.

The object of this bill is to have the whole tax declared void, and to restrain its collection.

The pincipal ground for the relief asked, is, that the act of the legislature of the state, passed February 27th, 1873, which provides for the taxation of shares in national banks, is void, for non-compliance with the conditions upon which, under the acts of Congress, such taxation by the state, or under its authority, is permissible.

The third section of this act is in these words:

"The stockholders of every national bank located in this state, or of any bank incorporated under the laws of this state, shall be assessed and taxed on the value of their shares of stock therein, in the precinct where such bank is located, whether the stockholders reside in such place or not. Such shares shall be listed and assessed with regard to the ownership thereof, subject, however, to the restriction that taxation of such shares shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon any other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of this state, in the county or precinct where such bank is located. The shares of capital stock of national banks not located in this state, held in this state, shall not be required to be listed under the provisions of this act. Each national bank shall furnish to the assessor a full and correct list of the names and residence of its stockholders, and the number of shares held by each, and the assessor shall report the same to the county clerk in his assessment return. The taxes against such shares shall be levied against the holder of the same, in the list of personal property, and shall be paid by the bank."

The revenue law of the state further provides that the value of stock in corporations shall be taxed, and that "in assessing the value of such stock, the actual value in cash of all the property that is represented shall be considered, and no deduction shall be made in such valuation by reason of debts owing by said corporation, unless, as in other cases, such deductions be made from the item of money and credits listed by said corportion."

The plaintiff contends that the act of February 27, 1873, is void, and no tax can be lawfully levied thereunder, because:

1. The act does not provide that the tax imposed on the shares shall not exceed the rate imposed upon the shares of banks organized under the authority of the state.

2. The act in effect provides for the taxation of the capital of the national bank, and not of shares in the hands of the stockholders thereof, forasmuch as thereunder, the valuation of the entire property of the bank is to be first ascertained, and the bank itself is to pay the taxes—the name of the stock holders being used merely to give to the proceedings the color of a tax upon the shareholder's interest.

The act of Congress, in express terms, allows the states to impose taxes upon the shares of national banks, and the only substantial limitation upon the power of the states is that they shall not subject these shares to taxation to an amount greater than they assess upon their own banks, or upon moneyed capital in the hands of their own citizens.

The first objection above stated to the state enactment is not well taken. The act provides in terms that the stockholders in all banks, state and national, shall be assessed and taxed on the value of their shares therein.

This is equivalent to a provision that there shall be no discrimination in favor of the state banks, and against the national banks; and it is not necessary that there should be added a clause that the tax imposed on the shares in national banks shall not exceed that imposed on shares in state banks.

It is next urged as an objection to the state legislation above mentioned, that it in effect provides for a tax upon the capital instead of the shares of the banks, and that as the capital of the plaintiff is invested in United States securities, which are exempt from taxation, the taxation under the law of the state is illegal. By recurring to the act of the state, it will be seen that it does not undertake to tax capital, but only shares, and that this mode is prescribed for shares in both classes of banks.

It is settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that, as respects the power to tax there is a distinction between capital and share; and that the shares may be taxed, although the entire capital of the bank is invested in United States bonds, and that in the valuation of such shares for taxation, such valuation is not illegal because the assessing officers have not deducted the value conferred upon the shares by the non-taxable United States securities owned by the bank. Van Allen v. Assessors, 3 Wall. 573; People ex rel. Duer v. Tax Commrs., 6 Am. Law Reg. 467. Lionberger v. Rouse, 9 Wall. 470.

These decisions are decisive against the objection we are now considering to the act of the state. It does not attempt to discriminate against the national banks, but provides one and the same mode for ascertaining the value of shares in the stock of all corporations, and more than this, the legislation of Congress does not require. Lionberger v. Rouse, supra.

The bill does not state that the valuation of the shares in the plaintiff's bank is in excess of their actual value, nor that the valuation of the shares in the State Bank of Nebraska is less than their real value, and states no fact showing that the taxation, which the plaintiff seeks to avoid, is in fact excessive or disproportionate. It is therefore destitute of any substantial equity.

It is alleged, on information and belief, that the capital of the banking partnership of Caldwell, Hamilton & Co., has not been assessed for taxation, but it is not stated that this has been intentionally done, nor does the bill negative that this may have been an accidental omission, and hence states no case entitling the plaintiff to relief against the payment of the taxes in question.

It is, however, insisted that the bank cannot be made liable in respect to the taxes on the shares, and that the collector ought to be restrained from making distress of the property of the bank. But the act of the state in terms provides that the taxes on the shares "shall be paid by the bank," and it is competent to make such a provision. National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall. 354; Lionberger v. Rouse, supra. Undoubtedly the bank could be made liable to pay such taxes by suit, and no reason is seen why the collection may not be enforced by distraint in the same manner as other taxes are collected. The demurrer to the bill is sustained and the bill dismissed. DECREE ACCORDINGLY.

Liability of Municipal Corporation for Failing to Keep Streets in Repair.

COLEMAN B. BROWN v. THE MAYOR, COUNCILMEN AND CITIZENS OF GLASGOW.

Supreme Court of Missouri, July Term, 1874.

Present, Hon. WASH ADAMS, " DAVID WAGNER, " WM. B. NAPTON, " H. M. VORIES, " T. A. SHERWOOD, } Judges.

1. Damages — Municipalities — Failure to Repair Streets—Measure of Liability.—City authorities are bound to keep in repair only such streets and parts of streets as are necessary for the convenience and use of the traveling public, and where, at the point of accident, the street was abundantly wide and well repaired to enable persons, with the exercise of ordinary care; to avoid the injury, the city will not be responsible merely from the existence of a defect in the untraveled portion of the street.

Error to Howard Circuit Court.

Mayor & Pitts, for defendant in error.

Turner & Caples and W. H. Lewis, for plaintiffs in error, cited Bassett v. St Joseph, 53 Mo. 290.

SHERWOOD, J.' delivered the opinion of the court

On the trial of this cause, the evidence tended to show that as plaintiff's wagon and team were being driven into the city of Glasgow, the team becoming frightened by persons riding up behind it and making a noise, commenced running away, whereupon the driver jumped out, leaving four women passengers in the wagon; that the horses then ran down the street towards the Missouri river, and, after running about five squares, ran into a hole or gully on the side of the street, causing thereby the death of one of the horses and serious injury to the other, as well as considerable damage to the wagon and harness; that the hole or gully was not in the traveled portion of the street; that the part of the street where the hole was, could not be traveled, but that opposite the place where the accident occurred, the street was fifty-five feet wide, and the traveled portion thereof was thirty feet in width, and was in such condition that wagons and teams could, without any difficulty, safely travel along free from any danger in consequence of the existence of the hole or gully referred to, if ordinary care were used in driving them. Evidence also was adduced as to the amount of the damage sustained.

Upon this alleged state of facts, the plaintiff sought a recovery from the corporate authorities of the city, and the jury, under the instructions of the court, rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

The instructions given on his behalf, were to the following effect: that the defendants were required to keep the streets of the city in a proper state of repair, so that such streets should be reasonably safe for travel; and any neglect in this particular, resulting in injury, would render them liable to the plaintiff to the extent of such injury, unless it were occasioned by the negligence or carelessness of plaintiff or his agent.

And the defendants were refused instructions, which told the jury, in substance, that plaintiff, before he could recover, must prove that the alleged injury was occasioned alone by the alleged defect in the street, without any fault, neglect, and mismanagement on the part of himself or his driver; and if that street was safe and in good order, of a sufficient width to have been traveled safely with ordinary care and prudence, and the damage was occasioned by the plaintiff's team getting from under the control of the driver, and running away outside of the usually traveled portion of the street, to the spot where the accident took place, the defendants were not liable.

In a case recently decided by this court, that of Bassett v. The City of St. Joseph (53 Mo. 290), the subject of the liability of cities in respect to keeping their streets in repair, is fully discussed, and many of the authorities reviewed and commented upon, and it is there held that the city is not "required or bound to keep all of his streets in good repair under all circumstances. She is only bound to keep such streets, and such parts of streets in repair as are necessary for the convenience and use of the traveling public. * * * There are streets or parts of streets in many cities, which are not at present necessary for the convenience of the public, which will be brought into use by the growth of the city, or there may be streets that have more width than is necessary for the present use or the requirements of travel. All that is required in such cases is, that the city see that as the streets are required for use, they shall be placed in a reasonably safe condition for the convenience of travel."

In Titus v. Inhabitants of Northbridge (97 Mass. 258), where there there was a defect in the highway, which the town was bound to repair, and a horse, by reason of fright or otherwise, becoming actually uncontrollable, ran until he came to the above mentioned defect, and an injury was thereby occasioned, it was held that the town was not liable for the injury, unless it further appeared that such injury would have resulted irrespective of the question whether the driver had lost control of the horse or not. And this case, although in conflict with the decisions in some other states, seems to me to enunciate the better doctrine. For it would certainly be a most unreasonable demand to require the corporate authorities of a city not only to provide safe and commodious streets for ordinary purposes of travel, but to provide thoroughfares of such ample dimensions and such matchless grade, that accidents, even from runaway teams, would be absolute impossibilities.

In the case at bar the evidence conclusively shows, that the thoroughfare on which the accident occurred was of sufficient width for all the travel usual thereon, and that the exercise of only an ordinary amount of care would have prevented any injury, notwithstanding the defects which existed in the untraveled portion of the street; and that the injury which occurred to plaintiff, was not the result of defect in the street per se, but of the driver losing or rather abandoning control of the horses.

For these reasons the instructions given on behalf of the plaintiff, although abstractly correct, should have been refused as having no applicability to the facts adduced in evidence.

On the contrary, the instructions asked by defendants should have been given; as not only did they state the law correctly, as laid down in the authorities I have cited, but they exactly fitted the case established by the testimony.

The judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded; all the judges concur. JUDGMENT REVERSED.

Notes and Queries.

I. APPEAL FROM SATISFIED JUDGMENT.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., Nov. 4, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In response to your request, I will state that the case I referred to in my communication, published in your "Notes and Queries," of the 30th of Oct. (p. 547), is that of Sharp v. May, decided at a late term of our supreme court, and not yet reported. It will appear in the 49th or 50th Ala. Very truly yours,

R. D. RUGELEY.

I. CAN A MUNICIPAL CORPORATION BE EMPOWERED TO ALTER ITS OWN CHARTER?

HOUSTON, TEXAS, Sept. 21, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.—The constitution of the state of Texas is silent upon the subject of corporations, excepting this provision, supplied by an amendment ratified in January, A. D., 1874:

"The legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say:— * * * * , incorporating cities or towns, or changing or amending the charter of any city or village, * * *. In all cases where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted."

At the same session of the legislature, January, 1874, the following act was passed:

An act to provide for the amendment of town and city charters.

SECTION 1.—Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Texas, that whenever in the judgment of the board of aldermen of any incorporated town or city, it becomes necessary or desirable to amend the charter of said town or city, the said board of aldermen shall prepare suitable amendments to said charter, and submit said amendments to a vote of the qualified electors in said town or city; provided, that in no instance where the incorporated limits of any town or city shall be extended as herein provided, shall it be lawful to tax the person or property embraced in said extension, to pay the then existing corporation debt, unless the same is agreed to by a two-third votes of the tax-payers embraced in said extension.

SEC. 2.—That said amendments shall be printed and posted in said city or town, or published in some newspaper in the county where said town or city shall be situated, for thirty days anterior to the day designated for taking a vote thereon.

SEC. 3.—Should a majority of the votes cast be in favor of said amendments, then and in that event said amendments shall be considered ratified and adopted, and shall be considered and held to be a part of the organic law of said city or town.

Digitized by Google

SEC. 4.—That no amendments shall be proposed or submitted by any board of aldermen which shall contravene, or be repugnant to the constitution or statute laws of this state.

SEC. 5.—That the election contemplated by this act shall be conducted in all respects as other elections for municipal officers in said city or town are by law required to be conducted.

Is the foregoing act valid? Can the legislature authorize municipal corporations to amend or alter their own charters? G. & S.

ANSWER.—The legislature may authorize a city to extend its boundaries, on a vote of the people, if there is no special restriction in the constitution. Such legislation is quite common in the states of this country. But an act authorizing a municipal corporation to alter its charter at will, subject only to the constitution and law of the states, strikes us as novel; and we invite discussion on the question.

III. APPEALS FROM JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—CERTIORARI.

We are glad that C. D. M. has taken the trouble to answer the query of "A Reader of the Journal," which appeared in our last issue. We are inclined to think that his answer presents the only correct view of the question. It certainly presents the matter in a clear light. Now will some of our readers do C. D. M. the favor of answering his query, which appeared in our last number?

BLOOMINGTON, ILLS., Nov. 17, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In answer to quære No. 1, page 574 of the JOURNAL, regarding the effect of a judgment upon a writ of certiorari, it may be said:

1. At common law, the office of a writ of certiorari, is to correct errors of law apparent on admitted or established facts, and is never resorted to for the purpose of settling disputed facts. Groeve v. Burwell, 1 Ld. Raymond, 471, 580; State v. Hendson, 3 Vroom (N. J.) 365.

2. At common law, circuit courts have power to award writs of certiorari only when there is no other method provided for directly reviewing the proceedings of the inferior court. Hence, it is not proper to grant a writ of certiorari if an appeal would lie. The People v. Williamson, 13 Ill. 660; Doolittle v. G. C. & U. R., 14 Ill. 381; C. & A. R. R. v. Whipple, 22 Ill. 105.

I take it, then, that the appeal in the case put was improperly taken, and would be dismissed on motion. From the fact that a writ of certiorari was awarded, it is evident that in the opinion of the superior court no appeal would lie. More than that, the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction in the case after having been served with the writ, the effect of which is to stop all further proceedings in the cause, and transfer the entire jurisdiction to the higher court. Hence, he had no power to grant an appeal. The defendant admits all the facts in the case by applying for a writ of certiorari, and must abide by the law as decided in the superior court. Many of the states have, by statute, modified and changed the law in regard to certiorari, which can be determined only by examining the statutes. C. D. M.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Nashville Commercial Reporter, for November 10, prints in its law department, the case of Miller v. Knight, in which the Supreme Court of Tennessee, ruled the following points:

1. The taking of a deed of trust by the holder of a note, prima facie, is an additional or collateral security, and does not prevent the holder of the note from suing both the principal and surety, and therefore does not operate to discharge the surety, although taken without the consent of the surety, unless it is otherwise expressly agreed.

2. The surety called on the holder and urged him to avail himself of the benefits of a deed of trust and file the claim; the holder replied that the surety need not trouble himself about the note, that he had it secured. Afterwards the principal to the note became insolvent, and the holder brought suits on the note against the surety, who filed his bill, and prayed to be discharged: Held, that the surety was not discharged on this state of facts.

In the opinion of the court, the following cases are cited: United States v. Hodge, 6 Howard, U. S. 75; Hill v. Bostick, 10 Yerg. 410; and Carpenter v. King, 9 Metcf. 511. The court also cites one or two other cases, but not by name—a vicious and reprehensible practice.

In Mayor and Aldermen of Memphis v. Woodward, determined in the same court, and reported in the same number of the same journal, it appeared that Woodward was elected physician to the city hospital of Memphis, gave bond and took the prescribed oath. Lynch, his predecessor, enjoined him and the city officers from interfering with the office. This bill was dismissed and Woodward was declared to be the officer de jure. In the meantime the city paid the salary of the office to Lynch. After the bill was dismissed Woodward sued the city for the amount of his salary. The court held, that notwithstanding Lynch discharged all the duties of the office, and the city was enjoined from paying Woodward the salary pending the bill, yet as Woodward was lawfully entitled to the possession and emoluments of the office he was entitled to recover against the city the amount of his salary. The following cases are cited in the opinion: Dodd v. Windsor, 2 Sneed, 673; Pearce v. Hawkins, 2 Swann, 89, and People v. Tann, 3 Barb. 193.

The same number of the same journal, contains the following interesting note of a case recently decided by the same court at Knoxville:

Where a bill sought by attachment and injunction, to reach funds in the hands of the tax collector and treasurer of a municipal corporation, and to subject those funds to the satisfaction of a judgment against the corporation, on which execution had been returned nulla bona, upon the ground that at the time the taxes were assessed the objects of the assessment were specified, one of which was that of paying the outstanding indebtedness of the corporation, and that the taxes collected for this object (the amount of which was not stated), constituted a trust fund and were being misapplied by the corporate authorities in paying the salaries of officers, etc., it was held that the allegations of the bill did not authorize the issuance of an attachment or an injunction. That so far as the bill sought to reach or interfere with taxes assessed and collected for the purposes of the municipal government, it was contrary to public policy, and could not be maintained as a garnishment bill. That the only ground upon which the bill could be maintained would be that the tax collector had funds in his hands which belonged specifically to the complainants, which funds he was fraudulently misapplying. That the bill failed to make such a case as would authorize the interposition of the court without interfering with, and obstructing the city government. Moore & Marsh v. The Mayor and Aldermen of Chattanooga.

The Legal Intelligencer, for November 13, publishes an important constitutional case—Woods v. The Secretary of the Commonwealth, in which it is held, according to the syllabus, that the constitutional convention of 1872–3 had not the power to adopt a constitution without its ratification by the people at an election.

Its other matter is selected.

The same case is published in the Legal Gazette of the same, date with the following syllabus and note:

The court affirmed the decree of the court below, because the adoption of the new constitution of Pennsylvania by the people, since the decree, "forbids an enquiry into the merits of this case;" but lest by affirming it, sanction might be given to the doctrines enunciated in the opinion of the court below, the court held:

1. A constitutional convention has no inherent rights. It exercises powers only, and only such as the people delegate to it in the mode prescribed by law.

2. To impute absolute powers to a convention of mere delegates, from a vote on the simple question of calling it, is an assumption without a just basis, against the security, the interest and the welfare of the people, which no body of men have a right to make.

3. The legislature may restrict the powers of a constitutional convention.

[The case of Wells et al. v. Bain et al., adverted to and the arguments therein contained, reiterated. The opinion in that case, and of the court below in this case will be found reported at length in 5 Legal Gazette, 397 and 400.—ED. GAZETTE.]

The Legal Gazette also publishes Williams v. Bankhead, Supreme Court of the United States, October term, 1874, with the following head-notes:

1. The bare title of a cause at the head of one or two orders of court—these being the only parts of a record in a concurrent proceeding sent here—in which orders the defendant is stated to be G. M. "et al.," is not sufficient to show that a partner of G. M., to-wit, one J. B.—not anywhere named in any portion of the record sent—was a defendant and party to the proceeding.

2. Where a proceeding in equity concerns the disposal of a specific fund, a person claiming the fund, and liable by a decree to have it wholly swept from him, is an indispensable party.

3. The general rules in equity relative to parties and the qualification to the rules stated.

It also prints the case of The Cashier of the First National Bank, etc., v. Mayer, in which the following points were ruled by the common pleas of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania:

1. A national bank may take judgment upon a note payable to the order of its cashier, in the name of the cashier only.

2. The taking by a national bank of a judgment-note running six months, and entering it up as a judgment, is not taking "other than personal security for the money."

It also prints the recently adopted amendments to the Constitution of New York.

The Albany Law Journal, for November 14, has some Ideas about Jury Trial. The editor does not believe that the proper way to improve juries is by abolishing them. He does not believe what Don Jose Ramon Saavedra, a learned (?) ecclesiastic of Santiago, Chili, has lately asserted, that trial by jury is derived from the inquisition. But the most sensible thing which he does believe is that "no juror ought to be tolerated in disclosing the votes of the jury in case of disagreement. It is against public policy to permit it." We say amen to this, and go further; we believe that no juror ought to be tolerated in disclosing what has transpired in the jury-room, whether there has been a disagreement or not. We believe that in addition to the oath now taken by jurors, each one should take an oath similar to that taken by the members of a court martial, and which might run as follows: "Neither will you disclose or discover the vote or opinion of yourself or of any other member of the jury, unless required to give evidence thereof by a court of justice in due course of law."

This number of the Albany Law Journal also gives a third instalment of the article on the Lateral and Subjacent Support of Lands, from Mr. Wood's forthcoming work on Nuisances. It also prints an opinion of the New York Commission of Appeals, Earle, Commissioner, in McCafferty v. Railroad Co., holding that a railroad company is not responsible for injuries caused by blasting done by their sub-contractors.

The Chicago Legal News, for November 14, publishes a long opinion of the United States Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois, on the right of a consolidated railway company, existing under charters granted by several states, to file a bill in the federal courts, and the power of a court of equity to name the place, prescribe the terms, and define the manner of one railroad crossing another.

Also a long opinion of Scott, J., Supreme Court of Illinois, in McKendree v. Tooke, a bill for specific performance of an executory contract to convey land. The opinion discusses when and under what circumstances a court of equity will decree a specific performance of a contract, when a vendee, in order to save his rights, must tender performance, when and how a contract may be forfeited, and the effect of giving a wrongful declaration of forfeiture by a vendor on failure of the vendee to make the first payment.

Also an opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois in Starkweather v. American Bible Society, holding that the American Bible Society, a corporation created and existing under the laws of the state of New York, is not capable of taking a devise of real estate in Illinois. The court cites approvingly its former decision, reported 6 Legal News, 43, that a foreign corporation cannot hold lands in Illinois beyond what is reasonably necessary for the transaction of the business for which it was created; that a corporation created in another state for the purpose of buying and selling lands, cannot come to this state and pursue the business for which the corporation was created; that conveyances to it of lands in this state were void and failed to pass title to the corporation. The editor of the Legal News says of this opinion that it "will affect heavy property interests. The appellees and other similar societies hold valuable lands under devises of this character. The question arises, can foreign corporations loan money in this state and take real estate security, and upon default of payment, take steps to enforce payment by sale of such real estate? We should say, in the light of these decisions, that such corporations can not become the purchasers of real estate to secure even the payment of a debt except as authorized by our statutes."

It also publishes an opinion of Mr. District Judge Treat of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, in Re S. H. Richardson, delivered on the 9th instant, holding that a bankrupt is entitled to exemptions out of partnership assets. This ruling appears to be founded in the more enlightened and liberal view of the meaning and policy of the bankrupt act; but the decisions on the question are variant.

It concludes with a per curiam opinion of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Brotherline v. Swires, on a question of fraud in a judicial sale. The editor of the Legal News says "there is more of the spread-eagle in this opinion than we ever saw in a judicial opinion of its length. It reads like the speech of a young man who has just entered college." We think so, but we have several laid up for future use, which beats this all to pieces. We shall, however, scissor out this, and put it in our box of curiosities.

The Washington Law Reporter, for November 10, publishes the case o Fallon v. The Chronicle Publishing Company, Supreme Court, District of Columbia, General Term:

The plaintiff, who was a newspaper carrier, alleged that a former proprietor of the Daily Morning Chronicle agreed to give him the exclusive right to sell and deliver that paper on a certian route in Washington, that such owner sold out to another person, and that defendant has succeeded to the ownership of the paper, and that he renewed the contract with both. He alleged performance, but claimed that defendant broke the contract by refusing to deliver to him any more papers. Held, that the plaintiff could not maintain an action on said contract, for the reason that it is void for uncertainty and want of mutuality, also for the reason that it is not alleged to be in writing or to be performed within a year, and is therefore void within the 4th section of the statute of frauds.

Also Gallaudet v. Sykes, same court, with the following syllabus:

1. A bill of exchange on three months, was drawn in New York upon S. in the city of Washington, and by him accepted for the accommodation of the drawer, and returned to such drawer in N. Y., where he negotiated it, upon an agreement that the person making the discount should retain a sum greatly beyond the rate of interest allowed by the laws of that state; it was held that the validity of the contract was to be determined by reference to the statute of N. Y., which declared a contract void when usurious, and that consequently the bill now in suit was void for that reason.

2. An acceptance is to be deemed a contract of the place where it is made; but where it is solely for the accommodation of the drawer, it is not a contract capable of being enforced until the paper is transferred to a holder for a valuable consideration, and that is to be regarded as the place of the contract, especially when no other place of performance is mentioned.

The Pacific Law Reporter, for November 3, publishes without a syllabus a very interesting opinion of Mr. District Judge Hoffman, of the Federal District Court of California, in Dibblee v. Ship Invincible, being a libel in admiralty against the ship, etc., for damages sustained by the injury which happened to a quantity of wine which had been placed on board said ship and stored in the deck-house by direction of the consignor, but which had suffered loss on the voyage to the extent of fifty-seven per cent. by "blowage," and "breakage," in consequence of the master having negligently omitted to ventilate the apartment in which it was stored. The court discusses the weight of evidence, and also the rule of law which charges the master of a vessel with diligence it preserving the cargo from damage during the voyage.

The same journal publishes several opinions of the Supreme Court of California, among them People v. Soto, in which it was held that in an indictment charging the animal stolen to be a cow, testimony is admissible to show that it was a heifer, and it will not be held to be a variance between proof and allegation.

The court (Crockett, J., delivering the opinion) discuss this question as follows:

"In the principal dictionary of our language, a heifer is defined to be a 'young cow.' It is true that under statutes very similar to ours, there are several decisions in the English courts, and some in the American courts, which would appear to sustain the proposition of the defendant's counsel. But the rule there was that penal statutes must be strictly construed, and nothing was left to implication. But this rule has been abolished in this state by the Penal Code, the fourth section of which provides that 'the rule of the common law, that penal statutes are to be strictly construed, has no application to this code. All its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice.' Tested by this rule of construction, it is evident, we think, that in making it a felony to steal a cow, the legislature intended to include under that designation a heifer also, which is but a young cow. The statute enumerates by particular designation cows, bulls, steers, and calves; and it cannot reasonably be inferred that it was intended to exclude heifers, but rather that it was the intention to designate them as cows."

The American Law Record, for November, re-prints from the Law Magazine and Review a long and curious historical sketch of the office of Sergeant at Law. It also reports the very long case of Holterhoff v. Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Association, Superior Court of Cincinnati, General Term, June, 1874. This case is one of great interest in connection with the law of life insurance, the question involved relating to a warranty in the application for the policy that the insured was a man of temperate habits. The discussion is very elaborate, even the syllabus being too long for our limited space. The case was before the same court on a previous occasion, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. R. 379.

The same journal also reports Schroeder v. Kisselbach, same court, with the following syllabus:

"Where an action is brought by a plaintiff upon an account, one item of which is for $1,930.78, for the price of a stock of goods sold and delivered to the defendant at the cost price thereof; and the defendant by way of counterclaim, sets up, among other items claimed in an account, one for $2,409.11, a balance due on a former account; and it appears that the defendant received the stock of goods in part payment for this item, and for which goods the plaintiff executed to the defendant a bill of sale under seal, acknowledg ing the receipt of $2,000 for the goods—all of which the defendant admits, but claims that he was only to allow the plaintiff as much for the goods as he might be able to realize net by their sale, which he claims was only $650.68; and then sets up that the price was fixed at $2.000 to hinder delay and defraud the other creditors of the plaintiff, he having himself made use of the bill of sale, and the former $2,409.11 indebtedness to successfully replevy the goods from plaintiff's creditors who had attached them. Held, that sale of and payment for the goods were fully executed by both parties, and defendant was properly estopped under the charge of the court from denying the price of the goods as fixed by the bill of sale. The form of the action being upon an implied executory promise to pay the cash value of the item, must yield to the actual nature and substance of the transaction, and the account will be held to indicate simply all the property and money the plaintiff furnished to the defendant during the whole time covered by the transactions stated in it, and this item to have been paid by the cancellation of so much of the item charged by the defendant against the plaintiff."

The American Law Register, for November, has an article on Special Agency, by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., of Chicago.

It also contains several well-selected cases. The following summary, which we take from its cover, will sufficiently indicate their contents:

New York Commission of Appeals.—Eaton v. Del., etc., R. R. Co.—Railroad—Negligence—Person riding without payment of fare in the caboose of a coal-train, is not a passenger—Business of railroads—Manager of freight or coal-train, though called conductor, has not powers of a conductor of a passenger train to create the relation of carrier and passenger between the company and a person coming on such train. Opinion by Dwight, Commissioner, with note.

Supreme Court of New Jersey.—Columbia Ins. Co. v. Kinyon—Insurance—Contract in another state from that of the company valid, and will be enforced, unless prohibited by positive law—Comity between the states—Regulation of foreign insurance companies—Registration for revenue purposes. Opinion by Van Syckel, J.

Supreme Court of Michigan.—Hamilton v. The People—Criminal law—Public holiday—Continuance of examination to, and proceeding on 22d February, when that day is non-juridical—Misjoinder of counts—Evidence to show motive in the accused—Co-defendant in a criminal case, turning state's evidence waives his privilege of refusing to answer—Waiver extends to his counsel and all professional communications—Character—Repudiation for veracity—Province of jury. Opinion by Campbell, J.

Supreme Court of Iowa.—Morrow v. Wood—Parent and child—Authority of school teacher to punish pupil—Where conflicting orders are given to the child by its parent and the school teacher, the former must prevail, and the latter has no right to compel obedience by corporal punishment—Public school where course of study is prescribed by law. Opinion by Cole, J.

United States Circuit Court, Wisconsin.—McFarland v. Goodman—Bankruptcy—Deed fraudulent as to creditors being set aside, the title reverts to the grantor and passes from him to his assignee, subject to all the usual rights of homestead exemption, etc., as if the deed had never been made—Voluntary joining by wife in deed afterwards set aside as in fraud of creditors does not prevent her on such setting aside from claiming dower or homestead in the land. Opinion by Hopkins, J.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE amendments recently proposed to the New York constitution appear to have been adopted by good majorities.

—JOHN ADRIANCE, a member of the New York bar, committed suicide the other day while in a temporary fit of insanity, by cutting his throat with a razor.

—GOVERNOR FOOTE, in his reminiscences, paints the following pen-picture of the celebrated Judge Martin, whose decisions adorn so many of the early reports of Louisiana:

—POSTMASTER GENERAL JEWELL is threatened with a suit for damages by the attorney of the Erie railway, who was debarred from practice before the postoffice department by his action.

—THE comptroller of Florida recently addressed the following question to the attorney-general of that state: "Are national banks, chartered by the United States, liable to pay state license?" This question Mr. Attorney-general Cocke answered in the negative, citing the following cases:

Van Allen v. The Assessor, 3 Wallace, 573; National Bank v. The Commonwealth, 9 Wallace, 353; Lionberger v. Rouse, id, 468; McCullock v. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 316.

—POSTMASTER GENERAL JEWELL will issue instructions to postmasters throughout the country, in a very short time, in explanation of their duties under the new postal law in carrying out that section of it in reference to the receipt of newspapers, periodicals, etc., and affixing of the new stamp gotten up for such mail matter.

—ANSEL STEVENS, who recently sued the Grand Trunk R. R. at Portland, for injuries received while traveling on a free pass, recovers damages for $12,833. The pass provided that the company should not be responsible for any harm that might befall the holder, and his journey was in the interests of the road. He, however, was on a Pullman car, and had paid for his berth. The decision, which is given by the United States Circuit Court, seems to set at naught an agreement in black and white, but it coincides with decisions in similar cases in one or two western courts.—[Chicago Railway Review.

—THE Daily Register enumerates the following prominent New York lawyers, who have died within the past fifteen years:

George Wood, William Curtis Noyes, James T. Brady, John Van Buren, Francis B. Cutting, Daniel Lord, Jr., James W. Gerard, Judge Edmonds, Solomon G. Hull, Judge Bonney, Alexander W. Bradford, Judge Slosson, Marshall S. Bidwell, Judge Dean, James R. Whiting, Townsend Scudder, Thomas C. T. Buckley, Jeremiah Larocque, Daniel S. Dickinson, C. M. Keller, Hugh Maxwell, who had retired many years before.

—THE Iowa Supreme Court has recently decided an important case growing out of the Chicago fire. Blederick & Miller shipped goods, via Merchants' Dispatch, to Davenport, which arrived at Chicago the night of Oct. 9, 1871, at the depot of the Rock Island R. Co. They were transferred from the cars to the depot, but not formally delivered to the railroad company. They were burned up when the city was burned. Suit was brought in the Scott County Circuit Court for the value of the goods. The defendants set up that their liability ceased when they placed the goods in the warehouse of the Rock Island Co.; that they only contracted to deliver the goods at Chicago. The plaintiffs claimed it was the duty of defendants to see that the goods were formally delivered to the railroad company, and placed in proper condition to go to their destination, and that their liability did not cease until the goods arrived at the point of destination. The circuit court held the defendants liable, and the supreme court sustained the court below.

"Judge Martin was a Frenchman by birth. He migrated to the United States in the days of his early manhood, resided for several years in North Carolina, and afterward located in Louisiana, where in a few years he was elevated to the bench, which he subsequently continued to adorn for many years. He was a man of most majestic stature, and had a face and head that alike indicated the high intellectual powers which he undoubtedly possessed, and that calm impartiality and conscientious regard for justice which rendered him an object of universal respect and confidence. His published opinions bear evidence of his extraordinary merits as a judicial functionary, and are justly regarded as of the highest authority in every state of the Union, especially upon questions of commercial law, or those involving the principles of the civil law system of jurisprudence. Judge Martin was for many years of his life in a state of total blindness; but he still remained upon the bench, where he continued to discharge his duties with steady industry, with unremitting zeal, and with a quiet, dignified, and patient demeanor which it was indeed most delightful to behold."

—THE compulsory education law, which goes into effect in the state of New York on the 1st of January next, requires every person having the control or charge of any child between the ages of eight and fourteen years, to see that such child has fourteen week's schooling each year, eight weeks of which must be consecutive. The penalty for not doing this, is one dollar for the first offence and five dollars for each week of neglect afterward, up to thirteen weeks in any one year; making a total of penalties per year, in each case, $66. The money thus collected is to be added to the school fund of the school district in which the offences occurred. If a child does not attend school as the law prescribes, he is to be deemed an habitual truant, taken charge of by the school authorities, and sent to a truant school. It is also provided that no person or company is allowed to employ any child between the ages of eight and fourteen years, in any business whatever, during the school hours of any school day in the public school in the city or district where such child is, unless such child has had, in the year immediately preceding such employment, fourteen week's schooling; and at the time of employing such child the employer must receive from the child a certificate of the teacher or school trustee certifying to such schooling. The duty of enforcing this law is imposed upon the trustees of school districts and public schools, and presidents of union school districts; or, in case there are no such officers, upon such officers as the board of education of the city or town may designate. The revised statutes make the neglect of this duty a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $250 for each offence.

COMPOSITIONS IN BANKRURPTCY—VARYING TERMS OF.—Mr. District Judge Blatchford has recently rendered an interesting decision in the case of Reiman and Friedlander, alleged bankrupts, on the question of the proceedings which are to take place when a resolution is passed under § 43 of the bankrupt act, as supplemented by the act of 1874, varying the terms of a composition between the bankrupt and his creditors already agreed upon. It appears that at a meeting of creditors there was a resolution passed varying a composition previously agreed upon and accepted. This resolution was confirmed in a regular manner, and when it was brought to the attention of Judge Blatchford, together with a statement of the assets and debts of the bankrupts, the latter asked that it be recorded and the statement placed on file. In giving his opinion on this point, the learned judge says:

The statute provides that the conditions may, by resolutions passed in the manner and under the circumstances provided in relation to an original resolution for composition, add to or vary the provisions of any composition previously accepted by them, without prejudice to any persons taking interest under such provisions who do not assent to such addition or variation. It further provides that any such additional resolution passed in the manner and under the circumstances aforesaid, shall be presented to the court in the same manner and proceeded with in the same way, and with the same consequences, as the resolution by which the composition was accepted in the first instance. This requires that after the resolution varying the provisions of the composition previously accepted, shall have been passed and confirmed and presented to the court, it shall be proceeded with in the same way as the original resolution was proceeded with. In regard to the original resolution, the statute expressly requires that the court shall, "upon notice to all the creditors of the debtor of not less than five days, and upon hearing, enquire whether such resolution has been passed in the manner directed by this section." It follows that this second resolution cannot now be recorded, but that a meeting, on notice to all the creditors, must be called in like manner as a second meeting was called in respect to the original resolution, to enquire whether the second resolution has been passed in the manner directed by the statute. As it appears that creditors who attended at the meeting when the second resolution was passed, objected to the passing of such resolution for reasons then and there stated by them, such creditors must have notice of the time and place of presenting to the court the proceedings of the meeting now to be called, so that they may be heard, and they will then be at liberty to present to the court, as well as any other creditors, any papers which are relevant to show that the composition is one which ought not to be sanctioned by the court.

NEGLIGENT KILLING OF SERVANT—LIABILITY WHEN DEATH IS INSTANTANEOUS.—The opinion of Mr. Circuit Judge Dillon, in Sullivan v. Union Pacific Railroad Company, which we elsewhere print, deserves, perhaps, a passing notice. It will be seen that the learned judge refuses to apply, in Nebraska, where the question is an open one, the so-called principle of the common law, that a master cannot recover damages for the negligent killing of his servant, when the death is instantaneous. It must have required some courage to lay down a doctrine at variance with the entire current of authority in England and America; but the judge shows that the prevailing doctrine had its origin in Baker v. Bolton, a nisi prius decision of Lord Ellenborough, rendered in 1808, and that, consequently, it was not a part of the common law of this country at the time of the revolution; and that, although followed in a late English case, and in several American decisions, yet these authorities were not binding upon him, and he was free to declare such a rule, applicable to the case before him, as was consistent with justice and legal reason. To the mind of the writer, the principle declared in Baker v. Bolton has always seemed to involve a gross defeat of justice and of common sense. To say that if you kill my horse instantly, I can recover its value, but that if you instantly kill my wife, child or other servant I can recover nothing for the loss of their services because the death was instantaneous, is sheer nonsense; and it is not to the credit of the American courts that they have engrafted such a barbarism upon our law, deriving it from no higher source than the declaration of a single English judge at nisi prius, pronounced since our revolution. If the writer is not mistaken, Mr. Bishop, somewhere in his works, has animadverted, in proper terms, on the slavish tendency of American lawyers and judges to adopt the doctrines of current English decisions, without considering whether they are founded in reason and justice, or whether they are at all applicable to our situation and institutions. Even some English text-books, which have never succeeded in acquiring any standing in their own country, have gone through several editions in this. The common sense of the American people, expressed through their legislatures, has, in several instances, repealed Lord Ellenborough's rule, where their courts have adopted it, and where the legislatures do not repeal it, we believe the courts will, and that, in a few years, there will not be a vestige of it left. CAN THREE MEN AT THE SAME TIME STRIKE A FOURTH WITH THE SAME CLUB?—Some time since (ante, p. 484) we referred to the fact that this question had been argued before the Supreme Court of Illinois. We now see from the opinion of the court which is published in the Bloomington Western Jurist, for November (Coates v. The People, p. 325), that the question was decided in the affirmative. The indictment charged that the three defendants "with a stick of wood, which each severally had and held in their several right hands," inflicted the mortal wound, causing death. The ground of objection was, that the act charged was physically impossible. The court (Mr. Justice Scott) said: "There is no physical impossibility in the act charged, however improbable it may be. What is to prevent all three of the persons accused having hold of the same stick with their several right hands at the instant the fatal blow was inflicted. The plea filed admits it was done in the manner charged, and there is nothing in the nature of the act that compels us to hold a mortal wound cannot be struck by three persons in that way." This ruling, singular as it may seem, is supported by a recent Massachusetts case, which holds that an indictment against three persons jointly, for an attempt to commit larceny from the person of the fourth, which charges that the three, with felonious intent, put "their hands" into his pocket, may be sustained by proof that all three were participating in the act, though only one of them put his hands into the pocket. Com. v. Fortune, 105 Mass. 592. The principal reason, however, which the Illinois court give for the conclusion to which they come, is that the Illinois statute makes all accessories at, or before the fact, principals, and provides that they shall be punished accordingly.

"They must," said the learned judge who delivered the opinion, "be indicted as principals and not otherwise. It might be advisable, as was said in Baxter v. The People, 3 Gilm. 368, to describe the circumstances of the offence as they actually occurred, but this is not indispensable. As in the case at bar, proof that either one struck the fatal blow with the weapon described, and that the others were accessory at the fact, would be sufficient to sustain a conviction of all of them as principals. There would be no variance in such a case between the proofs and the allegations in the indictment. This is the construction given to the statute in Baxter v. The People, and we see no reason to depart from it."

Railway Negligence—Fencing Side-Tracks.

A Missouri statute provides, in substance, that when any animal shall be killed by the cars or other carriage of a railroad company, the owner may recover its value without any proof of negligence or unskillfulness on the part of the agents or servants of the company, but it is further provided that the provisions of the section shall not apply to any accident happening where the road is inclosed by a lawful fence, or in the crossing of any public highway. In the case of Loyd v. The Pacific R. R. Co. (49 Mo. 199), it was held that where a cow was killed in the open grounds of a railroad, at a station or depot on the road, it being necessary for the transaction of business with the public, and the reception and discharge of freight and passengers, that such space should be left open, the company would not be liable without proof of negligence, notwithstanding the road was not fenced at such place, and that the same ruling would be made where the injury happened in a town where there were streets to be kept open, and where to fence the road would be to create a nuisance. In Morris v. St. Louis, Kansas City and Northern Railway Co., the Supreme Court of Missouri has recently restricted this interpretation of the statute, by holding that where a railroad company has a side-track extending for some distance from a station into the country, it must fence this and its main track, or it will be liable for damages resulting from the killing or injury of animals on them, without proof of negligence.

The evidence in the case tended to prove that the mules and colt sued for were killed and injured at a cattle yard, situate about one-fourth of a mile west of Thompson's Station, in Audrain county; that said station is situate in an open prairie country, has a passenger depot and stock-pens situate thereat, and a switch to the road has been constructed at the station, which extends west from the station to within about forty yards of the cattle-guard, where the injury to the stock took place; that from this cattle-guard west the defendant's railroad is fenced, but that the space of about one-fourth mile between where the mules and colt were injured and the depot, is open, unfenced prairie land; that the switch to the road extends west to within forty yards of where the fence inclosing the railroad commences; that the mules had entered on the road at or near the station, and had run down the track to where they were injured; that the train of cars by which the injury was inflicted was going west, and made no stop at the station; that the mules had escaped from plaintiff's pasture the night before the injury, and had gone on the track. The company were held liable to pay damages, without proof of negligence.

Mr. Justice Vories, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "There is no reason why defendant should not fence its road along each side of the road where it has a switch as well as at other places. Where a switch extends along the main track for a considerable distance through an open prairie, it is just as necessary and practicable to have the road fenced, as upon any other part of the road, and we are not inclined to extend the rule laid down in the case of Lloyd v. The Pacific Railroad Co., before referred to, further than the facts of that case will justify, and that is, that the company is not required to fence such grounds as are necessary to remain open for the use of the public, and the necessary transaction of business at the depot or station."

Judge Benedict's Case.

The case of Lange v. Benedict, which is pending before the Supreme Court of New York, at Special Term, Judge Van Brunt presiding, is one of great interest to the judiciary and to the profession. The defendant is United States District Judge for the Eastern District of New York, and the plaintiff is a publisher of good reputation, who, having been convicted of the offence of stealing government mail bags, was erroneously sentenced by the defendant to be imprisoned for one year and to pay a fine of $200; whereas, the statute under which he was tried provides for punishment by fine or imprisonment. A writ of habeas corpus was sued out, showing these facts, and was made returnable before Judge Benedict, who vacated the sentence, and then, against the protest of Mr. Lange's counsel, proceeded to re-sentence Mr. Lange to a year's imprisonment. A second writ of habeas corpus was then sued out Supreme Court of the United States, where the second sentence was adjudged to be void. In the meantime, Mr. Lange was held in prison under the second sentence, and there remained until the supreme court directed his discharge. A report of the case, with a full statement of the facts, will be found in 18 Wallace, 163.

Upon obtaining his discharge, Mr. Lange commenced proceedings in the Supreme Court of the State of New York, against the defendant for alleged false imprisonment, claiming $50,000 damages. By an agreement between Messrs. Arnoux, Ritch & Woodford, attorneys for Mr. Lange, and Messrs. Tracy, Catlin & Broadhead, attorneys for Judge Benedict, the complaint was drawn so as to set up all the facts in the case, and a demurrer was interposed by the defendant. This demurrer has recently been argued, and the judge has taken the papers and reserved his decision. The following brief synopsis of the arguments of the two leading counsel, is thus given by the New York Herald:

General Tracy presented an able and interesting argument, in which he contended that the courts have invariably protected the judges of the courts of record from any actions that might be brought against them by private suitors for any errors they might have committed in the judgments pronounced by them, and that this immunity was so complete and sacred, that such suit could not be maintained even when malice and corruption could be shown; that this immunity was due to the proper administration of justice, and that the wrong sustained by the suitor would be infinitely less than the injury that would result in the administration of justice, if the contrary view should prevail. Illustrating this part of his argument, General Tracy cited the famous case brought against the Recorder of London. The philanthropist, William Penn, was arrested and brought before the recorder for street-preaching. The jury, contrary to the charge of the recorder, acquitted the accused, and thereupon the recorder fined the jury and imprisoned the plaintiff who refused to pay the fine; he was discharged on habeas corpus and then sued the recorder for the false imprisonment. The court said that the maintainance of such an action would be more subversive of justice than the illegal act of the recorder. General Tracy also contended that the original sentence was valid and still in force if the subsequent act was illegal; that the original sentence covered a fine for one count in the indictment and the imprisonment for another count, and that the payment of the fine was illegally made, having been made to the clerk without any rule, and that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was based on an error in assuming that the fine was duly paid.

Mr. Arnoux, of counsel for Mr. Lange, opened his argument by alluding to the position of counsel who attacked the illegal action of those in power, and then gave a history of the case from its commencement until the hearing before the supreme court. Mr. Arnoux then proceeded to show that the unbroken current of English and American decisions was, that in courts of limited jurisdiction, the judge was not protected when he exceeded his jurisdiction, which was conceded by the defendant's counsel, and that every court had used language broad enough to cover the case of the acts of judges in courts of record who knowingly act without jurisdiction. To the glory of the judiciary, it appears that no judge of a court of record in America, and but one in England, had ever been successfully sued. The whole question in the case turns upon the legal effect of the second sentence. The supreme court declared that when the first judgment was pronounced and had been executed, the power of the court that sentenced Mr. Lange was ended, and, therefore, Mr. Arnoux contended that the second sentence was wholly without jurisdiction and void; that the first sentence, although illegal, was valid until reversed or vacated, and that made the case of the recorder a parallel case, but the second sentence was wholly coram non judice, and afforded no protection whatever to the court or officers in any respect.

Chloroform in Rape Cases.

The Monthly Western Jurist (Bloomington, Ill.) for November, contains a long and interesting article on this subject. After stating the law applicable to such cases, the writer details at length two celebrated cases which have occured in this country—that of Dr. Beale, a dentist, tried in Philadelphia, in 1854, and that of Dr. Green, tried in the Common Pleas of Mercer county, Ohio, in 1860. The former case is detailed at length in the Philadelphia Medical Examiner, for December, 1854, and also in Wharton & Stille's Medical Jurisprudence, §§ 245–267. In this case the defendant had administered an anæsthetic to the prosecutrix for the purpose of performing a dental operation upon her, and was charged, upon her unsupported testimony, with committing a rape upon her while under its influence. The other case was reported in the Cincinnati Lancet and Observer for May, 1860. The defendant in this case was likewise charged, upon the unsupported testimony of the prosecutrix, with committing a rape upon her by means of chloroform administered to her while sleeping with his daughter in a room adjoining that in which he slept. In each of these cases the prosecutrix claimed to have heen conscious of the crime which was being committed upon her, but that her will and physical strength were so far overpowered by the anæsthetic that she was unable effectually to resist. In the case of Dr. Green, the prosecutrix testified to the sensations she experienced at the time of the act. This case was that of a healthy girl seventeen years of age, who was delivered of a child which she claimed to have been begotten by the rape of which she accused the defendant. She told no one of the crime which had been committed upon her until six months had elapsed after its alleged perpetration—that is, she waited until her condition obliged her to tell some kind of a story. In both of these cases a sympathetic jury returned a verdict of guilty. New trials were refused; but Dr. Beale was pardoned by the governor, after a careful examination of the case. We are not advised of the final result of the case of Dr. Green.

Medical reseaches upon the effects of anæsthetics upon the human system seem to leave little room to doubt that both these convictions were erroneous. It seems highly propable that in Dr. Beale's case the prosecutrix simply labored under a delusion which females are frequently subject to under the influence of anæsthetics, and that, in Dr. Green's case, the charge was preferred by the prosecutrix when she discovered that she could no longer conceal her condition, and through a natural desire to account for that condition in some manner consistent with her innocence. The case of respectable and creditable women accusing dentists and other surgeons of having attempted to violate their chastity while under the influence of chloroform, is one of frequent occurence, and obliges such professional men to have a witness present during such operations, to insure their own reputation and safety. This fact should have raised such a doubt in the mind of the jury in case of Dr. Beale as to have led to his acquittal. The innocence of Dr. Green is vindicated by the fact that it appears to be a matter of universal experience in the administration, both of ether and chloroform, that sensation yields before volition, and that both sensation and consciousness yield before the power of muscular action ceases. Consequently, when the prosecutrix testified as to the sensations which she experienced during the act, while at the same time she was conscious of the nature of the act which was being committed, of the person who was committing it, and was yet without the power of motion or resistence, she was guilty of a fabrication so unscientific as to have convinced the jury, if properly advised by medical testimony, that her whole story was an invention.

The writer of the article in the Monthly Western Jurist, concludes with the following words of Dr. Wharton: "Sexual connection, therefore, with a person in an unconscious condition, is rape. But to support a conviction there should be, first, proof of the corpus delicti, which includes intent to use force. And, secondly, the reality of the unconsciousness must be proved. Non omnes dormiunt qui clausus et conniventes habent oculos." Whart. & S. Med. Jur. (1873), § 242; Wharton's Crim. Law (1874), § 1147. See also Tayl. Med. Jur. pp. 618–625.

Opinion by McKINSTRY, J., WALLACE, C. J., and NILES, J., concuring; RHODES and CROCKETT, JJ., dissenting.

Under the act of March 18, 1874, "to permit the voters of every township or incorporated city to vote on the question of granting licenses to sell intoxicating liquors," an election was held in the Fourth Township of Contra Costa County, at which a majority of the votes were cast "against licence."

The petitioner was afterwards convicted of an alleged violation of the law, as declared by the statute, and sentenced to imprisonmentin the county jail.

The power to make laws conferred by the constitution on the legislature cannot be delegated by the legislature to the people of the state, or to any portion of the people. Houghton v. Austin, 48 Cal., present term; Barto v. Himrod, 8 N. Y. 483; Bank of Rome v. Village of Rome, 18 N. Y. 38; Starin v. The Town of Genoa, 23 N. Y. 439; Clark v. The City of Rochester, 28 N. Y. 605; Thorn v. Cramer, 15 Barb. 112; Bradley v. Baxter, Ib. 122; Parker v. Commonwealth, 6 Penn. St. 507; Commonwealth v. Quarter Sessions, 8 Penn. St. 391; Locke's Appeal, 72 Penn. St. 491; State v. Wilcox, 45 Mo. 459; Rice v. Foster, 4 Harr. 479; State v. Copeland, 3 R. I. 33; R. R. Co. v. Commissioners of Clinton County, 1 Ohio N. S. 77; People v. Collins, 3 Mich. 343; Santo v. State, 2 Iowa (Clarke), 165; Geebrick v. State, 5 Iowa, 491; State v. Beneke, 9 Iowa, 203; State v. Weir, 33 Iowa, 134; Maize v. State, 4 Ind. 342; Meshmeier v. State, 11 Ind. 482; State v Swisher, 17 Tex. 441; State v. Panker, 26 Vt. 362.

Our government is a representative republic, not a simple democracy. Whenever it shall be transformed into the latter—as we are taught by the examples of history—the tyranny of a changeable majority will soon drive honest men to seek refuge beneath the despotism of a single ruler. To become a law an act must be passed through both houses of the legislature, be signed by the speaker of the assembly, and be approved by the governor; or, if vetoed by the executive, must again be passed by the constitutional majority. Thus, and thus only, can a general statute be enacted.

While the power and responsibilities of legislation remain where the constitution has placed them, a proposed measure, before it can become a law, must pass through the ordeal of a public and deliberate discussion in the legislature. "Public opinion will prevail; but it will be enlightened, deliberate, permanent, and organically expressed public opinion. It is this opinion alone which the constitution designed should govern. Such a government secures deliberation and responsibility in legislation, and affords protection against the despotism of official rulers, on the one hand, and of irresponsible numerical majorities on the other. It has been appropriately termed 'the flower of modern civilization.'" People v. Collins, 3 Mich. 416.

It is urged, however, that for the legislature to enact that a law shall take effect, provided the people of the state, or of a district, shall vote in favor of it, is not to delegate the law-making power. This position has been upheld by courts of high character, but I think the decisions in which it has been denied are sustained by the better reasons.

It is true a statute may be conditional; its taking effect may sometimes be made to depend upon a subsequent event. The last proposition is illustrated by the case of The Cargo of the Brig Aurora v. United States (7 Cranch. 382), in which the validity of a provision of the "non-intercourse law" was upheld. The provision was to the effect, that in case Great Britain or France should revoke or modify its edicts previously issued, so that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the trade suspended by the law should be renewed. It will be observed that in this instance the members of Congress exercised their own judgment, and amply determined that trade should be suspended, while the orders in council edicts should continue.

But it does not follow that a statute may be made to take effect upon the happening of any subsequent event which may be named in it. The event must be one which shall produce such a change of circumstances as that the law-makers—in the exercise of their own judgment—can declare it to be wise and expedient that the law shall take effect when the event shall occur. The legislature cannot transfer to others the responsibility of deciding what legislation is expedient and proper, with reference either to present conditions, or future contingencies. To say that the legislators may deem a law to be expedient, provided the people shall deem it expedient, is to suggest an abandonment of the legislative function by those to whose wisdom and patriotism the constitution has intrusted the prerogative of determining whether a law is or is not expedient. Can it be said in such case that any member of the legislature declares the prohibition or enactment to be expedient?

A statute to take effect upon a subsequent event, when it comes from the hands of the legislature, must be a law in presenti to take effect in futuro. On the question of the expediency of the law, the legislature must exercise its own judgment definitely and finally. If it can be made to take effect on the occurrence of an event, the legislature must declare the law expedient if the event shall happen, but indexpedient if the event shall not happen. They can appeal to no other man or men to judge for them in relation to its present or future propriety or necessity; they must exercise that power themselves, and thus perform the duty imposed upon them by the constitution. But in case of a law to take effect, if it shall be approved by a popular vote, no event affecting the expediency of the law is expected to happen. The expediency or wisdom of the law, abstractly considered, does not depen on a vote of the people. If it is unwise before the vote is taken, it is equally unwise afterward. The legislature has no more right to refer such a question to the whole people than to a single individual. The people are sovereign, but their sovereignty must be exercised in the mode pointed out by the constitution. Barto v. Himrod, 8 N. Y. 483; Rice v. Foster, 4 Harr. 479.

It was argued that the general statute which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors without license, and the "Local Option" statute should be read as one law, and, so reading them, that it is not left to the popular vote to give effect to the law, but only to determine whether licenses shall be issued under the law. This distinction seems to have been recognized by the Supreme Court of New Jersey, in State v. Morris, Common Pleas, November 1872. There a statute was sustained which, in itself, contained a prohibition of sales without license, and then left to the people in town meeting to say whether licenses should be granted. The supreme court of that state, after stating the test to be whether the enactment, when it passed from the hands of the law-givers, had taken the form of a complete law, said:

"If it (the statute) denounces as a misdsmeanor the selling of liquor without license, so far it is positive and free from any contingency; it is left to the popular vote to determine, not whether it should be lawful to sell without lisense, but whether the contingency should arise under which licenses should be granted." The New Jersey statute left the option whether licenses should or should not be granted to the people in "town meeting." The difference between the action of towns, as local governments, and a submission to the voters living in any merely territorial subdivision of a county, will be hereinafter pointed out. I do not think, however, that the distinction asserted by the Supreme Court of New Jersey can be maintained. A law being in operation authorizing the business of retailing liquors, provided a license be first obtained, the legislature enacts that the people of a town shall determine whether any license shall be granted. If they determine that licenses shall not be granted, none can be issued.

It is plain in such case that the law-makers do not intend to establish the new rule, until it shall have other sanction and allowance than that of the legislature itself. Licenses were granted by authority of the old law; they can be prohibited only by a new law. But in the case supposed, the legislature does not determine that licenses shall not be granted, but leaves it to the popular vote to determine the very contingency which the legislature must determine for themselves, in order to give effect to the law.

It is certain that the sections of the General Revenue Law relating to licenses to vendors of liquors, remain in force until the vote is counted and announced, as required by the statute; it is equally certain (if the statute is valid) that these sections cease to have force from the time the vote is announced, if the majority is against license. By whom, in such case, are the provisions of the Revenue Law repealed or suspended—by the legislature or by the people of the town?

And we are thus brought to another question: Can this law be sustained as in effect conferring on "towns" the power of regulating within their limits the sale of intoxicating liquors?

In determining this question I do not deem it necessary to decide any of the following:

1. Can the officers of a city or town be empowered to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors, and, if so, can they prohibit the sale, in certain quantities, under the power to regulate it?

2. Can a city or town by ordinance or by-law make that a criminal offence which is legalized by the general laws of the state?

3. Does an act of the legislature authorizing a by-law, the effect of which is to relieve those making sales of more than five gallons, within the town, from the payment of a license-tax, which those engaged in the same business outside of the town are obliged to pay, violate the provisions of the constitution: "All laws of a general nature must have a uniform operation?"

4. Would a law be unconstitutional which conferred a power upon the officers of a county or town to be exercised at the option of the officers, provided the people of the county or town should vote in favor of the exercise of the power by the officers?"

It is enough to say that this statute connot be sustained as conferring on the towns the power referred to, because no "towns" have ever been created in this state.

Our constitution, in terms, makes it the imperative duty of the legislature to create certain local governments. "The legislature shall establish a system of county and town governments, which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable throughout the state." Art. XI. sec. 4. "It shall be the duty of the legislature to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages," etc. Art. IV. sec. 37. The behest of the constitution as to "towns" will be obeyed when a system of town government shall be established by law.

When the system shall be established the towns may make such local rules or by-laws as they shall be authorized to make by the statutes which shall give them life and entity. The bestowal on them of the power to make proper local rules or by-laws will not be a delegation of legislative power conferred on the senate and assembly, because, as was said in Hougton v. Austin, the exercise of such power by the counties, towns, cities, and incorporated villages, is recognized by the same constitution which confers the general legislative power upon the state legislature.

But the constitution is not self-executing; the town governments must be created by statute. And it will be observed the constitution commands the legislature to establish a system of town governments. This form of expression conveyed a definite meaning when the constitution was adopted, and is at once understood by those familiar with the system of town government elsewhere; it would be meaningless, unless applied with reference to organizations, in their general features at least, like those in other states, where systems of town government had been established. To establish a system of government, the duties of the several local officials must be defined, in some of whom (or in the inhabitants of the town acting in a public capacity) a discretionary action must be vested within the scope of the powers given by the organic law which creates the system. In view of the origin of towns and their history in other states, I can conceive of no system of town government which is not continuous; which does not furnish officers to whom is given (during their term of office) the management of the machinery of local government, and which does not provide a legislative assembly, whose enactments shall be the product of deliberation and mutual consultation. This last seems the very life of any such system heretofore known in the United States. If the subjects of local legislation are committed to the people of the town, they must be committed to them as to a deliberative body; a project for a local regulation must be submitted to the wisdom and discretion of the people in organized assembly, by whom, after proper discussion and consideration, it may be rejected or moulded into a rule to be enforced as law. In our country the idea of legislation—in its broader sense, or as applied to local concerns—involves an examination into the merits of a proposed law by the assembled legislators. Under the system of town governments in New England, it has been the practice (by notice designating the question to be presented) for the select men to call meetings of the voters of the town—which are presided over by a moderator, and restrained by rules intended to secure orderly proceedings—at which the propriety and expediency of proposed measures may be considered, adopted or rejected. The voters of the town are supposed to be so few in number that they may act directly on matters of local concern, but they act as a subordinate, legislative and deliberative body in every sense that their representatives would so act, if representatives were selected by them. The matters of local interest are discussed in the town meeting, before they are passed upon. "The marked and characteristic distinction," says Chief Justice Shaw, in Warren v. Charlestown, "between a town organization and that of a city, is, that in the former all the qualified voters meet, deliberate, act and vote, whereas, under a city government, this is all done by their representatives." 2 Gray, 84–101. Mr. Quincy, in his Municipal History of Boston (p. 28), in explaining the causes which led to the establishment of a city government for Boston, while he proves that the town government had outlived its usefulness, shows, that before the city was incorporated, all the qualified electors constituted the local legislature. He says: "With a population upwards of forty thousand, and with seven thousand qualified voters, it was evidently impossible calmly to deliberate and act. When a town meeting was held on any exciting subject in Faneuil Hall, those only who obtained places near the moderator could even hear the discussion."

The system of town governments, as it existed in New York prior to 1846, is fully explained in the eleventh chapter of the first part of the revised statutes of 1827–8. There, as in New England, the towns possessed certain of the faculties of a body corporate, could sue and be sued, hold lands and make contracts necessary to the exercise of their corporate powers. In New York, as elsewhere, the citizens of towns chose certain town officers, and when assembled as a deliberative body (justices of the peace presiding), made "prudential rules and regulations" with respect to local matters committed to their discretion. In some other states this power would seem to have been vested in boards of trustees, who constitute the local parliaments.

The legislature of California has never established a "system of town governments." The word "town" is nowhere used in the statutes in the sense in which it is employed in the constitution. The supervisors are authorized (Pol. Code, sec. 4,046) to divide the counties into "townships," as they are authorized to divide them into election, school, road and supervisorial districts but the territory included in any one of the districts last name need not be the same as that included within the limits of a township. No township governments have been established. The only officers mentioned in the general laws as township officers, are justices of the peace and constables. The townships have neither been given personally, nor any other of the attributes of corporation; no official has been named, empowered to call the inhabitants or voters together for the purpose of consultation and joint action; no act has been passed providing for any presiding officer, or regulating the mode of conducting business, or of declaring the result of the action of the inhabitants or voters when assembled; and neither the voters themselves, nor any boards of officers elected by the voters, have ever been constituted a deliberative assembly for the purpose of adopting prudential rules or regulations in respect to matters placed under the control of the town governments.

The exercise by the town governments, when they shall be established, of the power to make local rules, will co-exist with the power of the state legislature to make general laws, and will apparently (but apparently only) constitute an exception to the rule, that the power to make laws, placed by the constitution in the senate and assembly, cannot be delegated. When the mandate of the constitution shall have heen obeyed and a "system of town governments" shall have been established, and when local legislatures shall have been organized under that system, the state legislature may confide to members of such local legislatures the task of deliberating and acting upon matters purely local in their nature. The legislature may give to the town governments, when formed, the right to make local rules; but the legislature has no more right to delegate to the people living within certain territorial limits, but who have no distinctive political character or governmental organization, the power to make laws, than it can delegate the same power to all the people of the state.

The statute of March 18, 1874, under the provisions of which the petitioner was convicted, does not itself establish any system of town government. The only officers who are directed to perform any acts are county officers; the election is to be ordered by, and the returns made, to the supervisors. There is no provision for an assemblage of the people of the town for deliberation; the vote to be taken can in no way be said to express the result of such deliberation. The constitution intended that the opinion of a majority should govern as to town matters, but that it should be an "organically expressed" opinion. The power to enact laws must be employed by the state legislature; that to make by-laws for a town by the local legislature; to become law or by-law it must first be considered by the appropriate deliberative body. The statute under consideration simply permits a species of plebiscitum with reference to a particular subject, in which the only option of the people of a township is to say "yes" or "no" to a complicated project. After the spasmodic effort at the polls, the "town government" (if this can be called one) subsides into inaction, without any form or power of self-vitalization, until again aroused to the exertion of its single function by the supervisors of the county. The statute furnishes neither a system nor a government.

When M. de Tocqueville and other writers, who have studied our institutions in a philosophical spirit, have expressed their admiration for the system of town governments existing in New England, as affording an excellent school of preparation for the discharge by the citizen of his duties to the state, it was in view of the public discussions in reference to affairs of local, but sometimes absorbing interest, at which all the qualified inhabitants of the town could be present, and in which all were authorized to take part. To substitute for such local legislation, where measures receive the sanction of law only after public interchange of opinions, the machinery of a "primary election," would be to degrade the whole system. That cannot be called a system of town government in which no deliberative assemblage is provided for, and in which a local law is adopted by the ballots of perhaps a bare majority, who vote secretly and without consultation with the rest of the voters; who are actuated by motives which need not be publicly avowed, or controlled by reasons, the weakness of which would be exposed by a public discussion.

I think, therefore, first—This statute is void, because it did not become a law when it left the hands of the legislature, but was to take effect only when it should be approved by a majority of the people of a township, and then only in the township where thus approved. Second—That this statute is not a law conferring upon towns, any govermental or police power.

Let the petitioner be discharged.

PETITIONER DISCHARGED.

NOTE BY THE COURT.—It is to be understood that the necessities of this case do not demand of the court to determine what powers may be granted to the towns. It may be difficult, perhaps impracticable, to draw the line by general definition; but it is certain that all the powers of legislation cannot be conferred on the counties or towns. As was said by Douglas, J., in the People v. Collins (3 Mich. 415), "only powers of legislation over matters of local concern can be delegated. If the legislature should attempt to invest the boards of supervisors with power to enact the entire civil and criminal codes which should be in force within their respective counties, this would be manifestly in violation of the true intent and spirit of the constitution."

It would be an entire abandonment by the legislature of the power to pass general laws, and would be destructive of our government; resolving the state into petty districts, or communes, each with different laws, to be enforced only within its own borders.

Negligence—Right to Recover Damages where Death is Instantaneous.

DANIEL SULLIVAN v. UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court, District of Nebraska, October Term, 1874.

Before Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Loss of Service—Instantaneous Death—Damages.—Where a servant is killed on the spot, by the wrongful act of the defendant, the master may recover for the loss of service. Where the death does not immediately ensue, but afterwards takes place, the master is not limited in the estimate of his damages to the period of the servant's death.

2. Injury to Servant Himself—Instantaneous Death—Right of Action.—Such a case distinguished from one for the injury to the servant himself. Without a statute, an action for such injury does not survive the death of the person injured, and cannot be brought by his representatives or next of kin.

3. The English and American cases, as to the remedy of a father for loss of the services of his infant child, whose death has been caused by the wrongful act of another, commented on.

Demurrer to petition. The petition represents that the plaintiff is the father of one James Sullivan, who was an employee of the defendant at $2.00 per day, which was received by the plaintiff; that his said son was 17 years of age; that, while in the service of the defendant, he was, by its negligence, "caught between the cars of the defendant and was fatally bruised and wounded, from which he died within six hours." The facts, intended to show that the death of the son was caused by the fault of the defendant, are fully stated in the petition, but it is not necessary to refer to them at length. The plaintiff claims as damages, the value of his son's services from the date of his death until he would have become of age, and also $20 for medical services, $10 for nursing and $250 for burial expenses, amounting, as alleged, to the sum of $3,412 for which judgment is asked.

Demurrer on the ground that the petition shows no cause of action.

Redick & Ferguson, for the plaintiff; A. J. Poppleton & E. Wakely, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—The plaintiff sues in virtue of his relationship of father, for the loss of the services of his minor son, and for special damages, which were occasioned by his alleged wrongful death through the negligence of the defendant. There is no statute in Nebraska giving such an action, and counsel concede that, at the time the present cause of action arose, there was no statute in the state like Lord Campbell's Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c.

Digitized by Google

93. This action must be maintained, therefore, if at all, on general or common law principles. In commencing our enquiries, let us ascertain the exact character of the action. When a minor child is injured by the tort of another, pecuniary damages result to his father as master entitled to his services, as well as to the child itself. Hence, two distinct actions may be brought. One by the parent or master for the loss of services, and another by the child, by its next friend or guardian, for the injury to itself. These are familiar and undisputed principles. But in the latter case, if the child should die in consequence of the injury, the cause of action did not, by the common law, survive, and by that law, no right of recovery, for the damages resulting from the death, existed in favor of his personal representatives or next of kin. It was to remedy this defect in the law, that is, to give an action to the personal representatives, where death ensued from the wrongful acts of another, that Lord Campbell's statute was passed. This is manifest both from its recital and its provisions. It did not provide for the case of masters, and their rights are not touched by it.

Is it, then, a principle of the common law, that where the death of the servant immediately ensues from the wrongful act of another, there is no remedy for the master, and that where it ensues therefrom afterwards, the master's loss cannot be estimated beyond the period when the death occurred?

Such a principle cannot be vindicated on considerations of reason, justice or policy, and I could only consent to recognize it upon being satisfied that it was one of the rules of the common law, so long and so well settled, that the courts are bound to accept and apply until it is changed by legislative action.

If the child of the plaintiff, had, by the wrongful act or neglect of the defendant, been disabled from work, but not killed, it is clear that the plaintiff would have his action for the loss of service. Fort v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. 17 Wall. 553. So, if the child thus injured was disabled from work thereby, and remained disabled for a year and then died, it is also clear, and has been several times decided, that the father or master could recover for the loss of his services down to the date of the death. Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180; Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. 493.

The negative of this proposition has never been judicially denied.

But if injury, caused by the tort of the defendant, is so great that death ensues immediately, does the law deny the master or parent all remedy, when, if the injury had been less, there would be, as we have just seen, a remedy at least to some extent? And when death ensues, whether sooner or later, does that limit the time down to which the loss must be estimated? The consequences of the injury where death happens, affect the father until the child would become of age, and to give damages only until the death, is to recognize the right of the father to compensation for the injury to him, but to stop part way in measuring the compensation.

It is evident, that since the father is entitled in law to the services of his child until majority, and since the wrongful act which causes the death of the child, deprives him of such services, we have here that damage and pecuniary injury which, on general principles, give a right to compensation. If such right does not exist, it is on the wrong-doer to show why. No attempt is made, and the attempt cannot successfully be made, to show that justly, the father in such case should have no compensation, or only a partial compensation, down to the date of the death. Accordingly, the civil law, and the French and Scotch law, recognize the right to maintain actions like the one at the bar.

To defeat the right of action, reliance is placed by the defendant solely upon the proposition, that the common law doctrine, as Lord Ellenborough is reported to have expressed it, in a case hereafter adverted to, is, that "in a civil court, the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury." Baker v. Bolton, 1 Campb. 493, 1808. It may be observed, that strictly the complaint of the plaintiff is not for the death of his son, but for the wrongful act, which, by producing the death, was the cause of his pecuniary damage. This is, perhaps, what Lord Ellenborough means, and I now proceed to enquire whether this is a doctrine of the common law, established so early, and so firmly as to be binding upon the American courts, and to be changed only by the legislature.

This makes it necessary to refer to the English decisions. This I shall do with all possible brevity, and shall then notice the leading American cases upon the subject. Whoever examines the cases critically, will, I think, come to the conclusion that an American court, in a state where the question is untouched, is at liberty to adopt a rule which is consonant with its sense of justice, and is not bound to regard the doctrine contended for by the defendant as binding upon it.

The earliest case upon the subject is Higgins v. Butcher, Yelv. 89.

The plaintiff's wife died of an assault and battery upon her by the defendant, and the plaintiff brought an action for the damages. The views of the court are thus expressed by Tanfield, J.: "If a man beat the servant of J. S. so that he dies of that battery, the master shall not have an action against the other for the battery and loss of service, because the servant dying of the extremity of the battery, it is now become an offence to the Crown, being converted into a felony, and that drowns the particular offence and private wrong offered to the master before, and his action is thereby lost." Obviously, the denial of the master's right is here placed upon the ground that the death of the servant having been feloniously caused, the private injury is merged in the public offence. This would not apply to any case in which the act producing the death, though negligent, was not criminal, and at this day would not be a ground on which to defeat a private remedy otherwise existing.

But the leading case to establish the doctrine maintained by the defendant is the nisi prius case of Baker v. Bolton, before mentioned, decided by Lord Ellenborough, in 1808. The plaintiff and his wife were upset while traveling on a stage coach of the defendants, and both were injured, and the wife died in about a month. The plaintiff, inter alia, sought to recover damages in respect of the loss of his wife's services, and Lord Ellenborough directed the jury that "the damages, as to the plaintiff's wife, must stop with the period of her existence," and the reason given was that "in a civil court, the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury." He cites no cases and enters into no discussion, and does not profess to rest upon precedent. The case was determined in 1808, and if it is the origin of the doctrine contended for by the defendant, it was decided at so late a period as not to be binding upon the courts of this country as part of the common law. I admit that it does hold the doctrine that the date of the death of the servant limits the period to which the loss of the master must be estimated.

The direct question did not again arise in England until as late as 1873, when Osborn v. Gillett, Law Rep., 8 Exch. 88, came before three of the judges of the court of Exchequer. Two of the Barons against one dissenting, there held that a master cannot maintain an action for a tortious act which caused the immediate death of the servant, and this holding, so far as it was placed upon precedent, was rested upon Baker v. Bolton. The opinions cover the whole ground, and it seems to me that the better reasons were with the dissenting Baron. The majority felt bound by Baker v. Bolton, but, as above suggested, it has no such authoritative force in this country. Whether the case was carried up on error does not appear. If it were, the judgment might well be affirmed, and yet an American court would be at liberty to decline to accept and apply its doctrine. It is noticable that no attempt was made by the majority to vindicate the doctrine they felt bound to follow.

The earliest and leading American cases are Carey v. Berkshire R. R. Co., and Skinner v. Housatonic R. R. Co., 1 Cush. 475, 1848.

One of these actions was by the plaintiff as widow, for the loss of the life of her husband, and the other by a father for the loss of service of his infant son, whose death was caused by the negligence of the company.

Is it not a little remarkable that the court treats the cases as involving the same principle, although the wife has no legal right to the service of the husband, nor common law right to recover for his death? and following Baker v. Bolton, the court decided that in neither of the cases could the action be maintained.

Another case is Eden v. Lexington, etc., R. R. Co., 14 B. Mon. 204, 1853, in which the husband sued for loss of service of his wife, who was instantaneously killed by the alleged tortious act of the defendant. The case seems justly open to the criticism of Bramwell, B., in Osborn v. Gillett, supra. Liability was denied except damages down to the time of the death, on the strength of Baker v. Bolton, and the common law rule asserted in that case is supported, by the judge delivering the opinion, to rest on the untenable ground that the public wrong merges the private injury.

In a similar action the Supreme Court of Michigan held that the husband could recover damages down to the death of the wife, but not beyond that event. This ruling was in accordance with what the court regarded as the common law rule, declared in Baker v. Bolton, and is quite at loss to discover its reason or philosophy.

On the other hand, in Ford v. Monroe, 20 Wend. 210, where the plaintiff's son was killed, there was a recovery for loss of services down to the period when he would have become of age, but the right to recover to this extent seems to have been assumed without question. The question was not decided in Pack v. New York, 3 Comst. 489, 493; and was expressly reserved by the court of appeals in Whitford v. Panama Railroad Co. 23 N. Y. 465, 1861. But in Green v. Hudson River R. R. Co., 2 Keyes 294, 1866, the court of appeals followed the doctrine of Baker v. Bolton. See Plummer v. Webb, Ware, 80.

The authentic evidence of what the common law is, must be found in the judicial reports. It will be seen that all the cases, English and American, on this subject, rest upon the nisi prius decision, in 1808, of Lord Ellenborough in Baker v. Bolton. Considering that it is not reasoned and cites no authorities, and the time when it was made, and that the rule it declares is without any reason to support it, my opinion is that it ought not to be followed in a state where the subject is entirely open for settlement. It would be different if the rule had been settled in England by a long course of decisions, made prior to the settlement of this country, as in that event the courts here would find it more difficult to receive it.

In view of the tenor of the cases, some of which, however, are not well considered, and all of which rest upon Baker v. Bolton, it requires some courage to disregard them; but as the rule they assert is incapable of vindication, and cannot be shown to be deeply rooted in the common law, my judgment is, that I am free to decide the rights of the parties without applying it.

With an amendment, in one respect, the petition sufficiently sets forth that the death of the son was caused by the negligence of the defendant, its servants and agents.

Life Insurance—Warranty.

JOHN CONOVER, EXECUTOR, ETC., v. MASSACHUSETTS MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court, Western District of Missouri, November Term, 1874.

Before Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Statements in Application, when not Warranties.—Where no specific and distinct reference was made in the policy to the written application, the statements in the latter, although it referred to the policy, and contained a warranty, were considered as representations, and not as warranties. The recent leading cases on this subject cited.

2. Untruthful Answers to Material Questions Defeat Right of Recovery.—Where the policy itself contains a condition that if the statements made by the applicant in the negotiations for the the policy shall prove untrue, the policy shall be void, untruthful answers, to material questions relating to the health and habits of the assured, will defeat the right to recover thereon, though the matters misrepresented did not cause or contribute to his death.

3. Statute Construed.—The act of the Missouri legislature of March 23, 1874, commented on and held not to apply to the case in judgment.

The defendant, through an agency in Missouri, issued a policy for $5,000 upon the life of Eli Barnum, the plaintiff's intestate, dated June 10, 1871, and which stated that "this policy is made and accepted upon the following conditions: In case the statements made by or on behalf of, or with the knowledge of the said assured to the said company, as the basis of, or in the negotiations for this contract, shall be found in any respect untrue, this policy shall be null and void."

The policy was issued upon an application therefor, dated May 27, 1871, signed by the applicant, and containing 32 special questions to be answered, and which were answered by him. The 7th question was, "does the party use alcoholic stimulents?" Answer. "No." 8th.—"If so, state how often? in what quantities?" Answer. "None." 9th.—"Has the party at any former time used alcoholic stimulents?" Answer. "No." 15th.—"Has the party ever had inflamatory rheumatism?" Answer. "No." 17th.—"Has the party now, or has he ever had an habitual cough?" Answer. "No." In the application or declaration was the following: "And I do hereby agree that the answers given to the following questions, and the accompanying statement, and this declaration, shall be the basis and form part of the contract or policy between me and the company, and I warrant such answers and statements as true and correctly stated, and agree that if the same be not so in all respects, the said policy shall be void, and all moneys which may have been paid on account thereof, and all dividend credits, shall be forfeited to the said company."

The last question was, "is the party and the applicant aware that any untrue or fraudulent answers to the above queries * * will vitiate the policy and forfeit all payments thereon? and has he carefully read the questions and answers thereto?" To which he answered in writing, subscribed by himself, "Yes."

The assured died within one year after the date of policy; and this is an action by his executor to recover the amount insured by the policy. The company defends the action on several grounds, but it is only necessary to state those on which the judgment of the court rests. The company pleads that the statements in the application as to the health and habits of the assured were untrue in these several particulars; viz.: at the time of signing the application, and for years previously he had habitually used alcoholic stimulants; that he had had inflamatory rheumatism, and for years labored under an habitual cough. He did not die of rheumatism or any pulmonary disease, nor, so far as appeared, in consequence of the use of alcoholic drinks.

The action was tried by the court, a jury having been waived. Without recounting the evidence of the various witnesses adduced by the parties, it is sufficient to state that the witnesses on both sides all concurred in the statement that the assured was habitually given to the use of alcoholic drinks; that he not unfrequently became intoxicated, though he would often, for weeks at a time, not drink at all. He was in the army, as a lieutenant in the fifty-seventh Illinois regiment, and it is clearly proved that he had a severe attack of inflamatory rheumatism in 1862, so severe that he had to leave his regiment and be taken to the hospital. It is also shown that he labored under an habitual cough while in the army. On the other hand, there is testimony to the effect, that at and about the time of his effecting the insurance in question, his general health was good.

After his death, and after this suit was brought and an answer was filed, the legislature of the state of Missouri passed an act, approved March, 23, 1874, as follows:

"Sec. 1. No misrepresentation made in obtaining or securing a policy of insurance in the life or lives of any person or persons shall be deemed material, or render the policy void, unless the matter misrepresented shall have actually contributed to the contingency or event on which the policy is to become due and payable; and whether it so contributed in any case, shall be a question for the jury.

"Sec. 2. In suits brought upon life policies heretofore or hereafter issued, no defence based upon misrepresentation in obtaining or securing the same, shall be valid, unless the defendant shall, at or before the trial, deposit in court, for the benefit of the plaintiffs, the premiums hereafter received on such policies, with six per cent. interest per annum from the date of receipt."

Henry Flanagan, John Conover and W. S. Everett for the plaintiff; H. K. White, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—Much of the discussion at the bar was directed to the point whether the statements in the application concerning the health and the habits of the assured were, under the language of the policy in connection with the language of the application, to be considered as warranties as maintained by the defendant, or representations as maintained by the plaintiff. It was not seriously denied by counsel that these statements were not true in point of fact, and hence if they are warranties, it is plain the plaintiff has no case. The plaintiff's position was that the statements were not part of the policy by insertions therein, or by distinct and specific reference in the policy itself to the application as part of the policy, and hence these statements in the application could, at most, only be representations; and being such, it was further claimed by the plaintiff that their untruthfulness, although relating to matters material to the company, on preliminary enquiries, were, in fact, as the event showed, immaterial, since the death was not caused by the diseases or habits to which the untruthful answers related.

Inasmuch as the policy itself does not distinctly identify and refer to the written application and make it part of the policy, I am inclined, in view of the established and reasonable rule, that warranties are not to be created or extended by construction, and the doctrines of the later and best considered cases, to hold, that the statements in the application are representations and not warranties. Campbell v. New England, etc., Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 381, 1867; followed in Price v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 17 Minn. 497, 1871; May on Ins.S ecs. 164, 165.

As this is the view most favorable to the plaintiff, the case will be decided on the assumption that it is correct.

It will be seen by reference to the statement of the case, that the policy itself contains a condition that if any "statement made by the assured to the company, as the basis of, or in negotiation for, this contract shall be found in any respect untrue, this policy shall be null and void;" and in the application the statements therein contained, "shall," it is declared, "be the basis and form part of the contract or policy" to be entered into between the parties. In the application the applicant declared that he had carefully read the questions and his answers to them, and that he was aware that if any of the answers were untrue or fraudulent, it would vitiate the policy.

The representations upon which the company grounds its defence, relating as they do to the habits of the assured, in respect to the use of alcholic stimulants, then and previously, and to whether he had ever been afflicted with inflamatory rheumatism (which it is well known often leads to fatal diseases of the heart), or had ever had an habitual cough (known to precede or indicate pulmonary diseases), were material, to enable the company or its medical advisor to form an accurate opinion as to the risk which the insurer was asked to assume. Now the policy itself contains the express provision, that if the statements of the assured, in the negotiations for the policy, shall be found untrue, the policy shall be void. This is the contract the parties made, and it is binding upon them; and for the policy shall be found untrue, the policy shall be void. This is the contract the parties made, and it is binding upon them; and the case is governed by and falls precisely within Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 4 House of Lords Cases, 484, 1853, in which eleven of the judges of England attended the summons of the House of Lords, and where the unanimous judgment was, in a case like the present, that it was erroneous to leave it to the jury, to say whether certain answers were material as well as false, and if not material to direct them, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. It was expressly decided that by the contract of the parties, the truth of the representations and not their materiality were alone in question, and if untrue, the insurer was not liable. That decison was followed in Cazenove v. British Ass. Co., 95 Eng. Com. Law, 437, 1859, and by the leading case of Campbell v. New England, etc. Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 381, 403, and in the well considered judgment in Price v. Phœnix, etc., Ins. Co., 17 Minn., 497.

These cases hold that where the insurer puts specific questions touching the risk, under conditions like those here agreed upon, the enquiries are conclusively made material and that false answers avoid the policy. It is not necessary in the case at the bar to go to the extent of affirming that all possible questions and answers are material, or may be made so, for here it is manifest that the questions, upon the answers to which the defence is based, pertaining to the habits of the applicant, in a matter material to health and to diseases he had had or was liable to have, were reasonable, and correct answers to which were essential, that the risk to be assumed by the company might be understood. In Anderson v. Fitzgerald, supra, Lord Chancellor Cranworth observed, that "whether certain statements are or are not material, where parties are entering into a contract of life assurance, is a matter upon which there must be a divided opinion. Nothing, therefore, can be more reasonable than that the parties entering into that contract should determine for themselves what they think to be material, and if they choose to do so, and to stipulate that unless the assured shall answer a certain question accurately, the policy or contract which they are entering into shall be void, it is perfectly open to them to do so, and his false answer will then avoid the policy. Now it appears to me, my Lords, that that is precisely what has been done here. The question for the jury to decide was simply whether it (the answer) was false or not. In that narrow compass the whole case lies."

I cannot refrain from observing, that it may be questionable whether the practice of the companies is, after all, so entirely reasonable, as it appeared to the Lord Chancellor. Life insurance has grown to such immense proportions as to have important public relations. It is the method which has been largely adopted to make provision for wife and children, and for those dependent upon the life of the assured. The judgments of courts touching the validity of policies, cannot be too carefully considered, so as not to work injustice either to the insurer or the insured. Courts, by a too liberal extension of the doctrine of warranties, and by recognizing the validity for provisions of forfeiture of the rights of the assured, and particularly in allowing the parties, by sweeping language, not fully understood or considered by the assured, when the policy is effected, to make immaterial questions and answers material, have, in my judgment, inclined too much in favor of the companies, and hence the judicial tendency of late is to uphold, rather than overturn the contract, when substantial justice requires it.

In view of the fact, that the Tables upon which the expectation of life is calculated, give the average mortality of persons as they run, while the companies select their risk, so that the actual mortalty falls below the assumed mortality, and in view of the practice of the companies to put a multitude of questions to the applicant, and to make correct answers to all of them material, I am inclined to consider the legislation of Missouri as well-timed and necessary to prevent the unfair practice of the companies in framing their policies, though it is perhaps too broad, if it prevents the companies from providing that wilful misrepresentation as to material facts will avoid the policy, although it may chance that the misrepresented matters did not actually contribute to the death of the assured. But as the act does not apply to the case in hand, I forbear further remarks upon its policy or meaning.

As the questions in this case were material, and the answers untruthful in material respects, and as the parties, in the policy itself, agreed that this should vitiate the policy, the judgment must be for the defendant. JUDGMENT ACCORDINGLY.

Notes and Queries.

I. FALSUS IN UNO, FALSUS IN OMNIBUS — CHARGING UPON WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

OSAGE MISSION, KAN., November 17th, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—The Supreme Court of Kansas, Judge Valentine rendering the opinion of the court, in the very recent case of Gannon v. Stevens, holds that the following instruction embodies a correct application of the maxim "falsus in uno falsus in omnibus;" to-wit: "In your examination of the testimony in this case, if you should be satisfied that any witness has testified falsely and corruptly in reference to any material fact, you should disregard the whole of the testimony of such witness." This ruling appears to be squarly in conflict with the following recent cases: Paulette v. Brown, 40 Mo. 52, 57 et seq; Mead v. McGraw, 19 Ohio St. 55; Plouchard v. Pratt, 37 Ill. 243, 246; Callahan v. Shaw, 24 Iowa, 441, 447. Can you or your readers refer me to any recent English or American case on that question, which sustains or agrees with the Supreme Court of Kansas? It would seem, upon principle, that where the jury are the exclusive judges of the facts, they ought not to be required to disregard all the testimony of a witness, though they may believe that the witness, under the influence of some strange motive, such as disgrace or interest, testifies falsely concerning a single material fact. SCIENCE OF THE LAW.

ANSWER.—We do not recall any case which supports the Kansas doctrine, and the strength of our impressions, derived from general reading, is against it. A judge sitting in equity or in admiralty, where it becomes his province to weigh evidence and determine disputed facts, might well prescribe to himself the maxim, falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, in such a case. Even here it should be done with great caution; for, as was said by Mr. Justice Story, in the Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. 338, 339, this maxim may properly be applied in those cases only where a witness speaks to a fact with reference to which he cannot be presumed liable to mistake. But when a judge instructs a jury, as matter of law, that they should follow this maxim in making up their verdict, he clearly invades their province, which is to pass upon the weight of the evidence without his control, and, as many of the western courts hold, without his advice. In England, however, and in some of the eastern states, where the judges are in the habit of giving the juries their opinion of the weight of the evidence, and of the value to be attached to the testimony of particular witnesses, such an instruction might meet with approval. The question is very interesting and important, involving, as it does, a discussion of the boundary line between the province of judge and jury, and we should be glad to hear from any of our readers upon it.

A CATALOGUE OF LAW BOOKS PUBLISHED OR FOR SALE BY MESSRS. BAKER, VOORHIS & CO., LAW PUBLISHERS, LAW BOOKSELLERS, AND IMPORTERS OF LAW BOOKS. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co., 66 Nassau St. 1874.

This is a handsome volume of about 150 octavo pages, finely printed and bound in cloth. It appears to embrace a very full list of reports, digests, text-books and statutes, now in print, or which have been published in England and the United States. It will be of great use to members of the profession, and we thank the publishers for this copy of it. We ask pardon for suggesting two improvements, should it be reprinted. One is to make the paging uniform throughout. In this edition the two parts into which it is divided are paged separately, giving it the appearance of two pamphlets bound together in a book. Another improvement, which would greatly enhance the value of such a catalogue to the profession, would be to give the most approved manner of citing each work embraced in it. The manner of citing law books now in practice among American lawyers and judges, is confusion worse confounded; and how to cite books, and how to decipher citations made by others, is one of the most difficult things for a young lawyer to learn. Mr. Bishop, in his First Book of the Law, a book which old lawyers may read without disadvantage, has done the profession great service by collecting a list of the principal law books in use in England and America, with the most approved manner of citing them.

THE LAW. A monthly magazine of legal matters for the Profession and the Public. Edited by F. G. M. Wetherfield, of Lincoln's Inn, Esq., Barrister at Law. Vol. 1, No. 1. Price, 1 shilling. London: Lockwood & Co., 7 Stationer's Hall Court, Ludgate Hill, E. C.

This is a small octavo of 72 pages, printed in the best style of the art. It consists of short essays on current legal topics, and an appendix of useful English statutes. We have read several of these essays with so much pleasure, that we trust "The Law" will conclude to drop in on us again, and become a regular vistor. If so, it will be the first English law journal that has accorded us that honor—which means that while our lawyers bellow current English decisions in the ears of our courts as though they were holy writ, English lawyers care no more for the decisions of our courts than for those of the courts of the Sandwich Islands. We judge from the tone of the articles in this number of "The Law," that its editor is a young Englishman. His views certainly do not savor of the old fogy notions of the last generation. Yet he seems to be a sort of conservative radical (for no enlightened Englishman can be altogether radical) on questions of law reform—conservative of what he thinks is right, and radical toward what he thinks is wrong. He thinks, for instance, that the remedy for preventing the scandalous multiplication of suits for breach of promise of marriage under a statute which permits the parties to testify in such actions, is to prohibit the giving of damages for the injured feelings. He does not believe in sumptuary laws, and thinks that Englishmen would not suddenly lose their liberties if juries were dispensed with, except in trials for treason and for crimes. He is likewise in favor of dispensing with that mediæval humbug which prohibits husband and wife from testifying for or against each other. In short, the editor of "The Law" has views on a variety of questions of interest to lawyers, and whether his views are sound or unsound, he is at least not dull. To the American lawyer, who has a little leisure, and who is disposed to employ that leisure in thinking of something besides money-getting, this publication will, we doubt not, prove an entertaining visitor.

HUBBELL'S LEGAL DIRECTORY, FOR LAWYERS AND BUSINESS MEN. For the Year Ending July 1, 1875. New York: J. H. Hubbell & Co.

This book aims to give a list of able and trustworthy legal correspondents; names of banks and bankers; the times and places of holding the state and federal courts; registers in bankruptcy; a concise, yet accurate synopsis of the bankrupt act; the laws of each state and territory, and of Canada, relative to the collection of debts; execution and acknowledgement of deeds and wills, taking of depositions, descent of property, interest, taxes, mortgages, claims against estates, etc. This information, the editor states in his preface, has been collected at great labor and expense. He writes annually, twenty-three hundred private letters, and the information furnished is "the result of a correspondence with nearly twelve thousand presidents or cashiers of banks, bankers or leading merchants throughout the country." The information as to the collection, and other laws of each state, is carefully compiled by a responsible attorney practicing in such state—"gentlemen," as the editor informs us, "of the highest standing in their profession, and of undoubted ability and experience." Turning to the pages which are devoted to those states with which we are acquainted, we become fully satisfied that this statement is not overdrawn. Thus, we find the laws relating to Iowa compiled by Messrs. Putnam and Rogers, of Davenport, a firm of very high standing, the latter gentleman a correspondent of this journal. We find Tennessee represented by Hon. Henry G. Smith, of Memphis, formerly a judge of the supreme court of that state, and a lawyer of great ability and extensive practice. The work for Missouri has been done by Messrs. Hitchcock, Lubke and Player, of Saint Louis, a firm of very extensive practice and high reputation. We have taken pains to examine this work in several particulars with which we are acquainted, and have found no inaccuracy; and we are satisfied that it is a work which will be of great use to business men, and indispensable to every attorney in active practice.

We have, however, noticed one mistake; and that occurs on the title page. The work purports to be "for the year ending July 1, 1875." This is a reckless statement which an editor, so careful in other respects, should not have made. Upon its very face, it cannot be true. Many of the judges and attorneys named in it may be dead, and many of the laws embraced in it may be repealed before July 1, 1875. An attorney or business man who buys this book in July next, may, therefore, be deceived by this title page into supposing that the facts which it collates are brought down nearly to the date of his purchase; whereas they will be, in fact, a year old. To illustrate: On page 339 we find the name of Richard Busteed given as United States District Judge for Alabama. Now, Richard Busteed was, no doubt, United States District Judge for Alabama at the time this book went to press; but he is not now, and it is morally certain that he will not be, at any time between now and the first of July, 1875, such United States district judge. With the exception of this inaccuracy, the book appears very complete and trustworthy, and we cordially recommend it to the profession.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Legal Intelligencer, for November 20, has a decision of the Philadelphia Common Pleas, Jones v. Park, holding that the legal remedy for disturbance of a right way, is an action of trespass on the case. Schroedeer v. Brememan, 11 Harris, 348, and Districh v. Berk, 12 Harris, 470, are cited.

It also reports a large number of discussions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, mostly unimportant per curiam opinions. We note, however, the following: Railroad Co. v. James; A city has the right, by virtue of its police power, to regulate by ordinance the speed of railroad trains.

The Allegheny Insurance Co. v. Hanlon: Where accounts are multitudinous, the witness may be allowed to refresh his recollection, by means of other accounts and papers as to the items.

Wharton v. Douglass: Parol evidence is not admissible to change or contradict the terms of a promissory note without an allegation of fraud. Citing Hoare v. Graham, 6 Barn. & Cres. 729; Free v. Hawkins, 8 Taunt. 92; Hill v. Gaw, 4 Barr, 493; Anspach v. Best, 4 P. F. Smith, 154.

Jonathan Sarver et al. v. William Gosser et al.: The courts of common pleas have equity jurisdiction to control the acts of a majority of a church corporation in violation of its charter.

McKinney v. Allen: In an action ex delicto, founded upon negligence, the sum laid in the declaration is the criterion of jurisdiction. Citing Barr v. Bayne, 10 Watts, 299.

Vensel et al v. Colner: Notice to the widow of partition and sale, from the recital in the order of sale, will be presumed, especially so after the lapse of twenty years.

Dilworth v. Ackley: 1. A note may be negotiated on the last day of grace as well as three days before.

2. The assignment of stock in an unincorporated joint stock company gives no right as a partner, but merely to so much capital as would appear after settlement to belong to the assignor.

The Legal Gazette, for November 20, publishes a syllabus and a statement of the great Memphis paving case, determined in the Supreme Court of the United States last spring. The editor apologizes for not publishing the opinion on account of its very great length. If the opinion is as long as the syllabus, his readers will excuse him for not publishing it. We agree with the editor of the Gazette when he says of this case—

"Jam redit et virgo: redeunt Saturnia regna:
Jam nova progenies cælo demittitur alto."

Notwithstanding it will appear in a few days, in 19th Wallace, its importance induces us to print the syllabus. It is as follows:

1. Where an individual contracted with a city corporation to pave its streets, and the corporation afterwards, by way of assisting him with funds, issued to him its bonds, having several years to run (and then worth in the market but 50 cents on the dollar), with the understanding that the bonds might be sold for what they would bring, and that other bonds might be afterwards bought by the contractor, so that the city might have its bonds again when they matured, and the contractor sold the bonds. Held, on a suit between the parties for a settlement under the original contract for paving, that the contractor could discharge himself from his obligation to return the bonds to the city, by charging himself with, and paying their market value at the time of accounting in the suit; and that he was not obliged to return the bonds in specie before he could compel the city to pay him for his work. Held further, that the fact that the city was pecuniarily embarrassed, and had no money with which it could go into the market and buy the bonds, did not alter the case.

2. Before a court will sanction the exaction of hard conditions made by a city with its contractors, who have been reduced to necessities by the omission of the city itself to keep with strictness its promises to them, it will be careful to know that every stipulation on the part of the city, under any new agreement, has been fully performed by it. Hence, where a city agreed to issue a certain amount of bonds to a contractor who was embarrassed in carrying on his contract with it, the embarrassment being produced, in part, through the city's own non-payment to the contractor of what it owed him, the contractor agreeing on his part, in the new agreement, to release the city from certain obligations under which, by the original contract, it was bound. Held, that the city not having carried out its new agreement completely, could not avail itself of the release.

3. Under the laws of Tennessee, and its own charter, the city of Memphis, in the state just named, had full power to make contracts for paving the city, and to bind itself to pay for the work either in cash or in the bonds of the city, or in both. Moreover, the city was liable on such contracts to a suit by the contractor. If the city has guaranteed payment for the paving, in case others (as the owners of property along the street) did not pay, and the highest court of the state decides that such owners cannot constitutionally be charged with the cost, and be compelled to pay, the city cannot allege the illegality of the contemplated mode of the contractors getting payment, as a defence to a claim on it for payment.

4. A waiver of the obligation by the city to pay, cannot be presumed from the fact that it and the contractors have looked to the property-owners to pay by an assessment on them, which the city had no constitutional power to make.

6. Where a city contracts with persons to do work for it, agreeing to pay them in bonds, having some years to run, and with interest warrants, or coupons attached, "principal and interest guaranteed and provided for by a sinking fund set aside for that purpose," and the contractor takes the bonds, but the city does not provide any sinking fund for the payment of either principal or interest, so that the bonds are worth in the market but about half their nominal value, the contractor to do the work, cannot, in a suit against the city to recover what it owes him, adduce evidence of bankers and stock dealers to show what damage, in their judgment, he has suffered by the city's violation of its contract in providing the sinking fund; in other words, to show what the bonds would have been worth if the city had kept its contract. Damages founded on such a claim are not in their nature capable of legal computation; there is no legal standard by which they can be fixed; they are shadowy, uncertain and speculative.

7. When the ordinances of a city, which has a "city attorney" as one of its officers, require that such attorney prosecute all suits to which the city may be a party, or in which it may be interested, persons who enter into a contract with the city under ordinances and on advertisements made pursuant to them, and on bids put in to pave its streets, with a provision in the contract that the accounts for the paving shall be made out by the city engineer, and delivered to the contractors for collection, and if not paid within ten days after the payment becomes due, "shall be placed in the hands of the city attorney for collection, under the city charter," cannot, even though those accounts are numerous, and the collection of them onerous and expensive, employ other attorneys, and charge to the city what they pay to the additional attorneys for their professional services.

8. The fact that the mayor and city attorney urged the contractors to make great efforts in the collections, and advised them to retain counsel in looking up titles and to aid in bringing suits, does not alter the case, there being no evidence that the city legislature, or any committee which was the agent of the city in making the contract, advised or assented to any change in its terms.

9. Where, under large contracts for paving a city, the city and the contractors to do the work having become embarrassed, have resorted to various rather irregular devices to raise money and carry on the work, the city issuing its bonds, and the contractors selling them at half their nominal value, and things between the parties have got into a confused and complicated state, and a suit at law has been instituted, and a bill and cross-bill in chancery filed, a court may not improperly (even before the case is ready for a decree, and without having settled the rights of the parties) refer the case to a master for an accouut of labor done and materials furnished, and the value thereof, and to find how many bonds the city has issued to the contractors, and whether such bonds had a value, and when they matured, and how much the city owed the contractors when the suit was brought, and—the parties consenting that the action at law be consolidated with the suits in equity—to hear and report to the court the proofs and his conclusions upon various matters deemed pertinent by the court, and specified by it, including as a final one, that he state an account between the parties, embracing therein all the matters in the cause of the bill and cross-bill, and showing in the result the aggregate of debt of the debtor party to the other. And if the parties do not except to such order, but appear under it before the master and take, both of them, testimony upon the subjects of reference, for as long a term as they desire, and then, announcing that they do not desire to take further evidence, submit the matters of reference for the determination of the master (taking no exception before him), it is no ground of error (the circuit court having passed upon his report, and with some modifications confirmed it), that before the cause was ready for a decree, and without settling the rights of the parties, the court referred it to the master for an account, and that the master took and stated an account under his own view of the law and the facts, and that he virtually decided the case instead of the courts deciding it.

The Western Jurist (Des Moines, Iowa), for November, has a twelfth instalment of the article on Tax Titles in Iowa; it reprints the Albany Law Journal's "Legal Aspect of the Beecher Scandal," and an article on "Salaries of Judges," in the same paper. It also publishes a decision of Mr. Circuit Judge Dillon, in Bronson v. Kukuk, determined in the District of Iowa, October term, 1874, with the following syllabus:

1. Until a patent for land emanates, the legal title thereto remains in the United States, and it will protect any equity which the United States may have in the land from a sale for taxes by the state.

2. In 1853, the plaintiff, as the assignee of a land warrant, located it upon a tract of land; in 1862, and before any patent had issued, the proper department cancelled the warrant and suspended the location, because the warrant had been procured to be issued upon false and forged papers; the plaintiff in the latter part of 1862, substituted another warrant, and in 1863 received a patent: Held, that the land was not taxable for 1861, and that a tax sale and deed for the taxes of that year were void.

3. The assignee of a land warrant, fraudulently procured from the government, has no higher legal rights than the warrantee; and the government, although the warrant is regular on its face, is not estopped to deny its validity, although it be in the hands of an assignee for value and without notice.

Also a decision by Dillon and Treat, JJ., in the United States Circuit Court, Western District of Missouri, in Opdyke v. Railroad Co., with the following syllabus:

1. When one who is not a party to a written agreement, but who is the person to be benefited by a performance of stipulations therein, may maintain an action against the promissor, considered.

2. On demurrer, held that if the facts alleged in the petition were true, the defendant had made itself liable for the payment of interest on bonds issued by another railroad company, containing a representation that the defendant had, in consideration of the lease to it of the road of such company, guaranteed the payment of such interest.

It also prints the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of Iowa, in Field v. Des Moines, which relates to the liability of a municipal corporation to pay damages when buildings have been torn down by its officers, in pursuance of an ordinance to prevent the spread of fires. Notwithstanding this opinion is also published in the Chicago Legal News (a journal which many of our readers take) we intend, on account of its exceptional interest, and the great number of authorities collated, to reprint it next week.

The Chicago Legal News, for November 21, publishes an interesting admiralty decision of Mr. District Judge Deady, in the case of the Hotspur, with the following syllabus:

When on a voyage from Glasgow to Buenos Ayres, from thence to Portland, Or., and back to a port in the United Kingdom, the cook and steward, who is not a seaman, is disrated a few days out from B. A. on a charge of wasting provisions, and put before the mast, it amounts to a rescission of the contract by the master, and the steward may, when he arrives at Portland, accept such rescission, and claim his discharge; but what compensation, if any, he shall have for his services, depends upon the particular circumstances of the case.

A contract by a minor to serve as a seaman is a voidable one; and may be avoided by such minor at any time before its completion, and thereafter he is not bound by it in any manner; neither can he sue upon it for his services, but may recover the value of such services, allowing for any injury which the owners may sustain by reason of the avoidance of the contract.

Where, under the British merchants shipping act of 1854, the duration of a voyage is described in the shipping articles as probably 12 months, a seaman signing the articles engages absolutely to make the voyage, whether the duration of it be more or less than that period, provided the master, in good faith, endeavors to accomplish the voyage within the time mentioned.

It also publishes a decision of the Supreme Court of Texas (Mr. Justice Moore delivering the opinion) holding that a mandamus will lie in the District Court, against the Commissioner of the General Land Office of Texas, to compel the performance of ministerial acts, where the law does not make the performance of the act discretionary. This case substantially overrules Bledsoe v. International Railroad Company, decided by the same court (ante, p. 401), and is one of great importance. Mr. Chief Justice Roberts dissented at great length, and with his usual ability and learning. These opinions probably touch upon all the learning upon the subject in the American books; and counsel in other states who may have occasion to investigate the question of the power of the judiciary to control the officers of the executive department of the government of a state, should not fail to possess themselves of these opinions. Some weeks since we received, through the courtesy of Mr. Chief Justice Roberts, both the opinion of the court and his dissenting opinion in this case; but our space has not permitted us to publish them, nor has our time permitted us to make such a synopsis of them as would do justice to them.

The Legal News also publishes a very interesting and important decision of the Kentucky Court of Appeals (opinion by Mr. Justice Lindsay), and states, editorially, that it relates to the right of a national bank to acquire a lien on its stock for advances to the owner of the stock, and the effect of bankruptcy proceedings upon secured claims. It is held that the bankrupt courts are not invested by Congress with sole and exclusive jurisdiction of a bankrupt's property, and that the assignee and general creditors may, if they deem it to their interests, relinquish, by non-action, to a secured creditor, the title to property upon which he holds a lien, and when they do so relinquish, the jurisdiction of the state courts to perfect or enforce the title thus acquired cannot be questioned.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE compulsory school law in New Hampshire seems to be working well. The percentage of non-attendants upon schools is gradully decreasing.

—THE recently adopted amendments to the New York constitution prohibit special legislation; forbid sectarian appropriations; deny perquisites to salaried officers; prohibit special privileges and charters to savings banks; extend the gubernatorial term to three years; and increase the salary of the governor to $10,000 per annum, and that of the lieutenant-governor to $5,000.

—ON the 20th instant, in the Brooklyn City Court, General Term, Judges Reynolds and McCue rendered decisions upon the argument of appeal of counsel in the case of Tilton against Beecher, in the matter of the order of Chief Justice Neilson, denying the right of defendant to a bill of particulars specifying the times and places at which the alleged acts of adultery were committed between the defendant and the wife of the plaintiff. The former-named judge affirms the order of the lower court, while Judge McCue dissents from the opinion of his associate. The case will probably be taken to the court of appeals.

—FROM a trustworthy correspondent, at Portland, Maine, we learn the following facts with regard to the recent case of Ansel v. Stevens, tried in the United States Circuit Court, at that place, before Mr. District Judge Fox and a jury: The learned judge gave certain instructions, not in writing, except as to certain points, and these are not now available for publication. The defendants propose carrying the case to Washington. The newspaper reports of the case are not altogether reliable. The passenger injured was traveling with an employee's free pass, on which was an endorsement expressly waiving all claim of damage in case of accident. But the learned judge directed the jury to find specially whether the passenger had read, or had knowledge thereof—and to this they replied "no." This materially modifies the statements of some of the papers, that the Circuit Court of Maine has decided that railroads are liable to persons traveling on a free pass, even though accompanied by a waiver of all claim for damages.

—PATENT OFFICE.—The annual report of the commissioner of patents, has been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior. From it it appears that the money received aggregates $721,111 35, and the expenditures $694,075. 71. The commissioner urges the necessity of preparing a digest of all the applications on file in the office. In making an examination of a new application, the examiner has to know all that is contained in all previous applications for inventions of the same class. In the class of sewing machines, for instance, 3,000 applications have to be examined. Twenty-five per cent. of the time of the examiner would be saved, by the existence of a digest of all applications on file in the office, which now number nearly 300,000. He also stated that additional room is required for the use of the offie. It is utterly impossible to properly transact the work of the office, in the narrow quarters granted to it. Eight additional rooms are needed immediately. The report pays a just tribute to the character of the persons employed in the patent office, and regrets that the salaries paid are not sufficiently large to retain the best men in the service, who are continually leaving it for more lucrative employment.

IN the article which we elsewhere print on Insurable Interest in Human Life, our readers will recognize the pen of Hon. James O. Pierce, of Memphis, whom we are glad to number among our occasional contributors. Few members of the profession have more thoroughly studied the law of insurance, and none are able to bring to the examination and comparison of adjudications a closer attention and more accurate discrimination.

"Actions Speak Louder than Words."

Hayes v. Kelley, recently determined in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, was an action for lime, etc., furnished according to account annexed. Answer, general denial. Case referred to auditor, whose report at the trial in the Superior court, before Brigham, C. J., was objected to on the ground that the plaintiff's books were impromperly admitted in evidence at the hearing. The objection was overruled, and the report was read to the jury, to which the defendant excepted. The man who once knew about the delivery was dead. The plaintiff called the defendant as a witness, but got little that was material to the issue from him. He was uncertain, he said; he did not remember; he might have had some of the goods, and he might not—at first he thought he had, and then he thought he hadn't; finally, he did not think he had any of them. The plaintiff then introduced a witness who testified that he presented the bill in suit to the defendant several times, at one of which the defendant objected to one item, in part, and at another time told his clerk to put the bill in the closet and when at leisure he would look at it, but he never at any time promised to pay it. When the evidence was closed, the plaintiff asked leave to withdraw the auditor's report. Leave was granted. The defendant excepted. The presiding justice, among other things, instructed the jury that when a bill of particulars is presented to a party, his conduct may be such, without his using any words to that effect, as to warrant a jury in finding such conduct to be an admission that the bill is accurate and is actually due. To this also the defendant excepted. The jury found for the plaintiff. The case was argued at the November sitting. We print below the brief of our correspondent, Pelham, who was of counsel for the plaintiff:

HAYES v. KELLEY.

PLAINTIFF'S BRIEF.

The prayers relating to the books became wholly immaterial, because the books were not in evidence. They were used only before the auditor; and when the auditor's report was withdrawn, all evidence from the books was withdrawn. The first question then, is—Had the presiding judge the right to permit the report to be withdrawn—or, to speak more accurately, to strike it out of the case? The plaintiff offered it; the defendant objected to its introduction; the presiding judge admitted it, notwithstanding the objection, and allowed the defendant his exception. What is this report? It is merely evidence—and the exception to striking it out, presents simply the question—Whether evidence, to which exception has been taken, and which has been admitted notwithstanding the exception, can afterwards be waived by the party offering it, and, in the discretion of the presiding judge, be stricken out? And I submit that it may be—and I add, is done every day.

The only other exception is, that the judge, among other things not objected to, instructed the jury that "where a bill of particulars is presented to a party, his conduct may be such, without his using any language to that effect, as to warrant a jury in finding such conduct to be an admission that the bill is accurate and is actually due." And unless this is true, there is nothing in the proverb that "actions speak louder than words;" or as Locke better expresses it—Actions are the best evidence of men's principles. To justify the remark of the judge, it is not necessary that actions should speak loud, but only that they should be intelligible; for the question does not respect noise, but perspicuity. And the eye judges of conduct not less certainly than the ear. When I see men inflating a balloon, I infer that somebody is contemplating to go up. When I present a bill of twenty different items to a man who owes me, and he turns to his journal and compares the bill with that, and with his pencil puts against each item a sign indicating a correspondence between his journal and the bill, and then opens his money-drawer and I see therein a file of unpaid bills, and mine that I had sent him a month ago, on top, and a broken eye-glass, a few envelopes and second-hand pens, a Boston cracker and a shoe-string—but no money—and he drops a tear into the drawer, and then takes down his check-book, and I see his bank account is already overdrawn, and he looks at me as though he needed a friend, and sadly shakes his head, and folds the bill and lays it away—is not his conduct such as to lead me to believe that he is satisfied the bill is right and wants to pay it, but has not the means? On the trial of an indictment for the larceny of a horse, it was said the jury were warranted in finding that the horse was of some value, upon evidence that he was a dark sorrel horse, weighing about nine hundred pounds, had a long tail and a bruise on one hip, and had been driven a long distance. Commonwealth v. McKenney, 9 Gray, 114.

Rescript by GRAY, C. J.—It was within the discretion of the judge to allow the plaintiff to withdraw the auditor's report. The instructions requested were immaterial, and those given were correct. Exceptions overruled.

Insurable Interest in Human Life.

The character and quality of the interest in the life of another which will support a policy of insurance upon that life, do not seem to be well settled, in several important respects.

1. It is so thoroughly settled as to have become axiomatic, that a wife has an insurable interest in the life of her husband. A late writer (May. on Ins. § 107), lays this down as "of course," without citing any authorities. The point has been expressly ruled as a commmon law doctrine, in Reed v. Royal Exch. Ass. Co., Peake's Add. Cas. 70 (1795) reported in 3 Bigelow's Cas. 2. Also in Baker v. Union Mut. Life Co, 43 N. Y. 283; Gambs v. Convenant Life Co., 50 Mo. 44; St. John v. Amer. M. Life Co. 2 Duer, 419. The basis of this interest is not defined. From the analogies of other insurable interests, which have a pecuniary basis, it would seem to be the support which the wife is entitled to claim from the husband (see 2 E. D. Smith, N. Y. 268). The insurable interest of a reputed but not legal wife, in the life of the husband with whom she cohabited, was sustained on this ground in Equitable Life Soc. v. Paterson, 41 Geo. 338. And a woman engaged to be married was held to have such an interest in her intended husband's life, in Chisholm v. Natl. Cap. Life Co., 52 Mo. 213. It may be assumed that love and affection alone should furnish a sufficient basis for the wife's insurable interest, in analogy to other marital relations. But this does not appear to have been established by the decisions. They are simply pervaded with the doctrine that the interest exists, which is generally recognized by the courts as "of course."

2. Whether any other relationship will alone support a life policy, may be doubted. A dictum of Clifford, J., in Phœnix Mut. Life Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616, asserts the general proposition in these words: "It is sufficient to show that the policy is not invalid as a wager policy, if it appears that the relation, whether of consanguinity or affinity, was such * * * as warrants the conclusion that the beneficiary had an interest, whether pecuniary or arising from dependence, or natural affection, in the life of the person assured." It is reported as lately decided by a Pennsylvania court, in Kane v. Reserve Life Co., 1 Cent. Law Jour. 345, that the relation of father and son suffices to establish an insurable interest in the life of the father, and in 6 Gray (infra) it is said as a dictum, that without pecuniary interest, and not on the ground of support, but merely on considerations of strong morals and the force of natural affection, the father's policy would be supported.

But the decisions generally are not in accord with thsee dicta. In Miller v. Eagle Life Co., 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 268, Woodruff, J., draws from the cases the following deductions:

"A strong probability of pecuniary benefit from the continuance of the life, without a strict legal claim to such benefit, is sufficient to save the contract from being deemed a wager." "From the nature of the case, an insurance upon life is an insurance of the benefits to result to the insured from its continuance. These are all that render the life insured valuable to him."

A majority of the reported cases will be found to be rested upon such pecuniary considerations or expectations. Thus, it has been held that a sister had an insurable interest in the life of her brother, where she had been supported by him. Lord v. Dall, 12 Mass. 115 (1815). And that a father has this interest in the life of his minor son, because he is entitled to his earnings. Mitchell v. Union Life Co., 45 Maine, 104 (1858); Loomis v. Eagle Life Co., 6 Gray, 396 (1856). Per contra: A father has no insurable interest in the life of his son, merely from relationship. Halford v. Kymer, 10 Barn. & Cres. 724 (1830); nor does the mere relationship of a brother suffice to furnish such an interest. Lewis v. Phœnix Life Co., 39 Conn. 100 (1872).

3. The weight of authority is, therefore, evidently in favor of resting all insurances on lives of relatives upon a pecuniary basis, such as supports a policy as between debtor and creditor. As to this there is now no apparent conflict in the authorities. Any pecuniary interest will support a policy, which will not be measured with exactness by the extent of that interest. But in case of debtor and creditor, the amount of the policy must not be so exceedingly disproportionate to the debt as to make the transaction in effect a wager. Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 643; Mowry v. Home Ins. Co., 9 R. I. 346. In 15 Wall. case the debt was $70.00, and the policy was $3,000, and this was held a wager.

4. There must, however, be some pecuniary interest in the life insured. It was said in Trenton Mut. Life Co. v. Johnson, 4 Zabr. (N. J.), 576, that no pecuniary or insurable interest is necessary to support the contract. But this is doubtless to be regarded as a dictum, inasmuch as there was in that case a pecuniary interest existing, which would support the contract according to the weight of authority. Other dicta to similar effect appearin the decisions; but there is no reported decision to this effect, unless it be Kane v. Reserve Life Co., supra. The New York Court of Appeals decided that a policy would be void when taken out by one as beneficiary, who had no pecuniary interest in the life insured; and that this was the rule at common law, of which the statute, 14 Geo. 3, against wagering policies, was merely declaratory. Ruse v. Mut. Ben. Life Co., 23 N. Y. 516, 24 do. 653. (But the same court afterwards avoided this very question in Rawls v. Amer. Mut. Life Co., 27 N. Y. 282). Mr. May has expressed the general result from the reported decisions, in these words: "When it is said that fire, life and other insurances where valued policies obtain, are contracts of indemnity, it is simply intended that to support them the insured must have some interest in the thing insured. The amount of this interest, and the amount to be paid in case of loss, may be fixed by arbitrary agreement, even before the loss" (§ 7). "When the insured has nothing to lose, but everything to gain by the happening of the event insured against, it would be dangerous and demoralizing to subject the insured to so great a temptation, to destroy the property or the life upon which the insurance is effected. A sound public policy will not sanction any such temptation" (§ 75).

5. The policy being issued to one who has the insurable interest, can it afterwards be assigned or sold to one who has no such interest? Mr. May answers this question in the negative, considering it "an attempt to do indirectly what the law will not permit to be done directly" (§ 398). But the decisions do not agree on this point. Such an assignment is supported in St. John v. Amer. Mut. Life Co., 2 Duer, 419, and 13 N. Y. 31, and Valton v. Natl. Life Co., 22 Barb. 9, and 20 N. Y. 32, on the ground that the policy being originally valid, the insured had a right to dispose of it as he saw fit, and the assignment did not change the liability of the insurer. Such an assignment is declared void, as a mere speculation in life policies, in the later cases of Stevens v. Warren, 101 Mass. 564; and Franklin Life Co. v. Hazzard, Sup. Ct. Indiana, 2 Ins. Law Jour. 180. The last case is an exceedingly well reasoned one, and may perhaps be accepted as furnishing the better version of the law; though Mr. Bigelow, reporting the case in 3 Bigelow's cases, p. 559, doubts its correctness. Mr. May on the other hand, endorses it (§ 398).

6. If the person whose life is insured may not assign the policy to a stranger after it is issued, may he do the same thing contemporaneously with its issuance? Can A. contract with an insurer, for a policy on his own life which shall be from the beginning payable to B., who has no interest in that life? This was the subject of a judicial doubt in Wainwright v. Bland, 1 Mees. & W. 32 (1836). But the doubt was resolved in the negative in Shilling v. Acc. Ins. Co., 2 Hurls. & N. 42 (1857), where it was held that such insurance is void. In this country some exceedingly nice distinction, have been drawn in considering this question. For while in Stevens v. Warren, supra, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held the assignment of a policy after issuance, to one who had no insurable interest, void (intimating that the consent of the insurer might have validated it), the same court held in Campbell v. N. E. Mut. Life Co., 98 Mass. 381, that one taking out a policy of insurance on his own life, might make it payable to whom he pleased, without regard to interest. Dicta to the same effect are found in Rawls v. Amer. Mut. Life Co., 27 N. Y. 282 (1863), and Amer. Life & H. Co. v. Robertshaw, 26 Penn. St. 189 (1856), in both of which cases the insurable interest actually existed. The Superior Court of N. Y. City, in Hogle v. Guardian Life Co., 4 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 346 (1868), upheld a policy so effected, declining to consider the question of interest which was held to be immaterial. But the Court of Appeals of New York seemingly cast doubt upon that proposition, by saying in the later case of Baker v. Union Mut. Life Co., 43 N. Y. 283 (1871), that one can make such insurance on his own life payable to any one having an interest in his life. And the Supreme Court of the United States, in the still later case of Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 643 (Dec., 1872), has plainly taken the opposite view. The policy in this case was taken out by Lewis upon his own life, but for the benefit of Cammack, who was held to be protected only to the extent of his actual pecuniary interest in the life of Lewis, all beyond that being, as to Cammack, a mere wager.

The question whether the insured or the beneficiary was the contracting party, does not seem to have been taken into account, in the case cited in note 2, supra. Nor is it discussed especially in 15 Wall. The reasoning of the cases in 98 Mass. 27 N. Y., 4 Abb. Pr. R. and 26 Penn., is, that as the contracting party has an insurable interest in his own life, the contract has the proper basis at its inception, and will therefore be supported. These cases exhibit the tendency of the American courts. But the doctrine advanced by them seems plainly open to Mr. May's criticism of "doing indirectly what the law will not permit to be done directly;" a practice which the 15 Wall. case refuses to sanction. If the beneficiary may not himself contract for insurance on another's life in which he has no interest, because it would be a mere speculation upon human life, 23 N. Y. 516, 24 N. Y. 653, 39 Conn. 100 (supra) the questions may well be asked: 1. Is it any less a wager when the insured himself makes the contract for the benefit of one who has no interest? 2. How can the insurable interest of A. in his own life support a policy, which, by its own terms, can never, for an instant of time, even at its inception, inure to the benefit of A., his widow, minor children, executors or creditors, or of any one else having an insurable interest in that life? To the first question the cases in 98 Mass. and 15 Wall. give contrary answers. The second needs to be plainly and authoritatively answered by the American courts.

—THE world continues to move. A young lady desirous of entering the law school of Cuzco, an institution supported by the state, wrote to the government to inquire if her sex were a bar to her admission. The Minister of Justice promptly replied that all Peruvian citizens should enjoy equal rights; that women were considered by the law as on the same footing with men, as far as the privileges to be accorded by the republic were concerned, adding that it was a matter of peculiar pleasure to the administration to improve the opportunity of giving publicity to such a declaration.

Destruction of Buildings to Prevent the Spread of Fires.

FIELD v. THE CITY OF DES MOINES.

Supreme Court of Iowa, October Term, 1874.

Hon. J. M. BECK, Chief Justice.
" WM. E. MILLER, }
" C. C. COLE, } Judges.
" JAMES G. DAY, }

1. Municipal Corporations—Destruction of Building to Prevent Spread of Fire—Liability of City for Acts of its Officers.— Municipal corporations, whose officers are by statute and by ordinance authorized to order the destruction of any building or fence, "when they shall deem it necessary to arrest the progress of and extinguish" a fire, are not liable to the persons whose property is thus destroyed, in the absence of a statute creating such liability.

——. ——. Eminent Domain.—The destruction of buildings, etc., under such circumstances, is not a taking of private property for public use within the meaning of section 18 of article 1 of the constitution, but is a regulation of the right which individuals possess to destroy private property in cases of necessity, to prevent the spreading of fire or other great calamity.

——. ——. ——. The legislature cannot authorize the taking of private property for public use, except upon first making or securing just compensation therefor, and any statute professing to do so would be void, and confer no authority to that end.

On the 17th day of January, 1874, the plaintiff filed his petition, stating, in substance, that the defendant is a municipal corporation, organized under the laws of Iowa; that on the 4th day of July, 1872, there was a fire in progress within the limits of the city, and near the buildings of the plaintiff; that there was then in force an ordinance of the city, passed December 10th, 1868, entitled "An ordinance establishing and regulating a fire department," section 16 of which is as follows: "The engineer in command, or in the absence of the engineer, the mayor or any three trustees, may order any building, erection, or fence, torn down or blown up, where they shall deem it necessary to arrest the progress of, and extinguish the fire;" and section 20 of said ordinance is as follows: "Every person, not a fireman, who shall be present at a fire, shall be subject to and obedient to the orders of the chief and assistant engineers, the mayor and trustees, fire policeman, marshal and police contsables of the city, provided, said officers shall wear their respective badges of office, in extinguishing the fire, and the removal and protection of property, and in case such person shall refuse to obey such orders, he shall forfeit and pay a fine not to exceed five dollars for each offence, and all such officers shall have power to arrest any person or persons so refusing to obey such lawful orders as aforesaid, or suspected of stealing during the progress of the fire, and hold them in custody until after the fire is extinguished, and then to be dealt with according to law."

It is further alleged that at the time of said fire, "the engineer in command" of the fire department of the city was absent from the city, and that the said fire being in progress, the mayor then assuming in that behalf to act as the agent and official representative of the city, in virtue of his powers and duties as such officer and agent, and particularly in virtue of a pretended right and authority conferred upon and vested in him as such officer and agent by the sections of said ordinance above set out, for the pretended and alleged purpose of arresting the progress of and extinguishing said fire, did order the bystanders to tear down two certain buildings belonging to plaintiff, situated on lot one, in block 31, in the city and in the vicinity of the fire, which order was by them there obeyed, and said buildings torn down and destroyed; that there was no real necessity of tearing down either of said buildings, and that in giving said order the mayor acted carelessly, negligently and without sufficient cause; that if said buildings had not been torn down they would not have been burned by the said fire, nor was the fire either extinguished or arrested by tearing down said buildings, or either of them. The value of the buildings is alleged at seven hundred dollars, and that the plaintiff has demanded compensation therefor, from defendant, which was refused.

To this petition defendant filed a demurrer, which being sustained, and the plaintiff refusing to amend, judgment was rendered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Gatch, Wright & Runnels, for appellant; C. P. Holmes, for appellee.

MILLER, C. J.—1. That any person may "raze houses to the ground to prevent the spreading of a conflagration," without incurring any liability for the loss to the owner of the houses destroyed, is a doctrine well established in the common law. The maxim of the law is, that "a private mischief is to be endured rather than a public inconvenience." 2 Kent's Com. 338. Lord Coke Says: "For the commonwealth, a man shall suffer damage; as for the saving of a city or town, a house shall be plucked down if the next be on fire. This every man may do, without being liable to an action." Mouse's Case, 12 Coke, 63; Id. 13. In Republica v. Sparhawk, 1 Dall. (Pa.), McKean, Chief Justice, says: "Of this principle, there are many striking illustrations. If a road be out of repair, a passenger may lawfully go through a private enclosure. So, if a man is assaulted, he may fly through another's close. In time of war, bulwarks may be built on private ground. * * * Houses may be razed to prevent the spread of fire, because of the public good." In Dillon on Municipal corporations, § 756, the learned author states the common law doctrine as clearly and succinctly as it is anywhere to be found. He says: "The rights of private property, sacred as the law regards them, are yet subordinate to the higher demands of the public welfare. Salus populi suprema est lex. Upon this principle, in cases of imminent and urgent public necessity, any individual or municipal officer may raze or demolish houses and other combustible structures in a city or compact town, to prevent the spread of an extensive coflagration. This he may do independently of statute, and without responsibility to the owner for the damages he thereby sustains." The ground of exemption from liability in such cases is that of necessity, and if property be destroyed, in such cases, without any apparent and reasonable necessity, the doers of the act will be held responsible. In support of this doctrine, see Governor and Company of, etc., v. Meredith, 4 Term R. 794, 797; Taylor v. Plymouth, 8 Met. 462, 465; Mayor, etc., of N. Y. v. Ford, 18 Wend. 126, 132, 133; same case, 17 Id. 285; Dunbar v. Alcalde, etc., of San Francisco, 1 Cal. 355; Surocco v. Geary, 3 Id. 69; Conwell v. Emprie, et al. 2 Ind. (Cart.) R. 35; American Print Works v. Lawrence, 3 Zabriskie, 590, 609, 610; same case, 1 Ibid, 248; McDonald v. City Red Wing, 13 Minn. 38.

The plaintiff does not, however, seek to recover against the mayor who directed, and the persons who assisted in, the destruction of his buildings, but he seeks to make the city liable on a principle of respondeat superior. It is claimed that the destruction of plaintiff's buildings was not necessary in order to extinguish or prevent the conflagration then in progress; that the act was, therefore, not justifiable at the common law, under the rule of necessity, and that since the city, by its ordinance, had authorized the mayor to judge of the emergency, and direct the destruction of the buildings, an act which any individual might do at his peril without any statute, it thereby made the act that of the corporation.

Of course, unless the corporation had authority conferred upon it by the statute defining its powers, to destroy buildings or other property, for the purpose of arresting the progress of a fire, or the power conferred upon it to pass the ordinance set out in the petition, it could not exercise such power, and would not be liable for the acts of its officers which it had no power to authorize. Dunbar v. The Alcalde, etc., of San Francisco, 1 Cal. 355, and cases cited; see also, The City of Burlington v. Kellar, 18 Iowa, 59; Clark v. City of Des Moines, 19 Iowa, 198; Clarke, Dodge & Co. v. The City of Davenport, 14 Id. 494; Taylor v District Tp. of Wayne, 25 Id. 447.

Municipal corporations, or certain officers thereof, are often appointed by statute, or by ordinance authorized by charter or statute, to judge of the emergency and direct the destruction of buildings and other property to prevent the spread of fire; and such corporations are frequently, by their charters or by some statute, made liable for damages which property owners may sustain by reason of their buildings or property being thus destroyed to prevent the extension of fires. But the liability of the city or town in such cases is held to be purely statutory, and unless the statute clearly makes the corporation liable to make compensation, it is not liable at all. In White v. The City Council of Charleston, 2 Hill (South Car.) 571, which in its facts is essentially like the case before us, the city council acting under the general municipal powers of the city, and without any express statute creating a liability, adopted an ordinance authorizing the intendant, among other officers, in time of fire to demolish such buildings "as may be judged neccessary" by him to arrest the spreading of the fire, thereby investing the officer with the power to judge whether the necessity existed or not. A fire being in progress, the plaintiff's house was blown up by order of the intendant, and the fire was subsequently extingushed before it reached the house destroyed. In an action of trespass by the owner against the city, it was held that, the city being a public corporation, it was not liable to an action by individuals, unless it be given by statute. Judge Dillon, in a note to section 758 of his work on Municipal Corporations, says of this case, that "the result was right, but assuming the power to pass the ordinance, the decision should be placed, we think, upon the ground that the intendant was discharging a public, as distinguished from a municipal or corporate duty, and is not in this matter to be regarded as the agent of the city, and therefore the city would not, on the principle of respondeat superior, be responsible for his acts." We will not stop to determine which is the true basis on which to rest the decision, for upon either ground the result is the same, that the city is not liable.

In Fisher v. The City of Boston, 104 Mass. 87, which was an action to recover damages for personal injuries to the plaintiff, caused by the alleged negligence of the officers and members of the fire department in performing their duties in putting out the fire in the city, it was held that the corporation was not liable, although the fire department was established and regulated under a special statute, which by its terms required acceptance by the city council before it took effect. It was said by Gray, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, that "the extinguishment of fires is not for the immediate advantage of the town in its corporate capacity," and it was held that in the absence of an express statute, municipal corporations are not liable for injuries occasioned by reason of negligence in using or keeping in repair the fire engines of the city.

It is further held, in the same case, that it makes no difference whether the legislature itself prescribes the duty of the officers charged with the repair and management of fire engines, or delegates to the city or town the power to define those duties by ordinance or by law.

In McDonald v. The City of Red Wing, 13 Minn. 38, it was held that a city is not liable for the destruction of a building torn down to arrest the progress of a fire, unless such liability is created by statute; and that it makes no difference whether such building is torn down under the direction of the city officers assuming to act in their official capacity, or by the citizens and by-standers on their own motion.

In Wheeler v. The City of Cincinnati, 19 Ohio State, 19, the Supreme Court of Ohio said, that "the laws of this state have conferred upon its municipal corporations power to establish and organize fire companies, procure engines and other instruments necessary to extinguish fire and preserve the buildings and property within its limits from conflagration, and to prescribe such by-laws and regulations for the government of said companies as may be deemed expedient. But the powers thus conferred are in their nature legislative and governmental; the extent and manner of their exercise, within the sphere prescribed by statute, are necessarily to be determined by the judgment and discretion of the proper municipal authorities, and for any defect in the execution of such powers, the corporation cannot be held liable to individuals, nor is it liable for a neglect of duty on the part of fire companies, or their officers, charged with the duty of extinguishing fires."

In Western College, etc. v. The City of Cleveland, 12 Ohio St. 375, which was an action against the city to recover for property destroyed by a mob, based upon a clause of the city charter in reference to the city council, which provided that "it shall be their duty to regulate the police of the city, preserve the peace, prevent disturbances and disorderly assemblages," it was held that the duty intended was that properly appertaining to an administrative and legislative body acting in the government of the city—the making regulations, by-laws and ordinances for the purposes specified, to be enforced by the appointment of officers; and that neither on general principles, nor from the effect of the enactment, was the city responsible for the destruction of property by a riotous assemblage of persons, or for the neglect of the officers in not preserving the peace and preventing the destruction of property.

In Dunbar v. The Alcalde, etc., of San Francisco, 1 Cal. 355, it was held that a municipal corporation is not liable for the destruction of a building in pursuance of the direction of its officers, where no statute exists creating such liability. This decision was made in a case where the building of plaintiff had been blown up by the alcalde and other officers of the city during a conflagration, for the purpose of staying its progress, and where the destruction of the building by fire was not inevitable.

In Russell v. The Mayor, etc., of New York, 2 Denio, 461, the statute provided "that when any building or buildings in the city of New York shall be on fire, it shall be lawful for the Mayor, or in his absence, the recorder of the city, with the consent and concurrence of any two aldermen thereof, or for any three aldermen, to direct and order the same or any other buildings which they may deem hazardous and likely to take fire, or to convey the fire to other buildings, to be pulled down and destroyed." The statute also provided for an assessment of the damages which the owners of buildings thus destroyed should sustain, and for the payment thereof by the city, and it was held that the city was not liable, in an action at common law, for the loss of personal property deposited in a building destroyed by virtue of an order of the mayor, etc., pursuant to the statute to prevent the spread of fire; that the statute provided for compensation only to the owners of buildings thus destroyed, and to those "having an estate or interest" in such buildings; that the owner of personal property deposited in, and destroyed with the buildings, was not within the statute, and could not, therefore, recover. It was further held in that case, that the authority conferred by the statute upon the officers of the city, is a regulation of the right which individuals possess to destroy private property in cases of inevitable necessity, to prevent the spreading of fire; that in making an order for the destruction of a building, pursuant to the statute, the officers do not act as the agents of the corporation, but as magistrates designated by law for the execution of a public duty, and that the corporation was not responsible for their acts any further than the statute had made them so.

In Stone v. The Mayor, etc., of New York, 25 Wend. 156, it was held that the lessee of a building in the city of New York, destroyed by firemen, by order of the mayor, to prevent the spread of a conflagration, was not entitled to recover damages for merchandise in the building at the time of its destruction not belonging to him, but the property of others, and which was in his possession as a factor or merely on storage. The ground of this decision, like that in Russell v. The Mayor., etc., supra, is that there was no liability on the part of the city to make compensation for the property destroyed, except as, and to the extent, provided by the statute; that unless the statute created a liability on the part of the city, none existed. This is the doctrine of all the cases we have found, with the single exception of Bishop & Parsons v. The Mayor, etc., of Macon, 7 Geo. 200. There the city was held liable for blowing up the building of the plaintiff. No authority is cited except Lord v. The Mayor, etc., of N. Y., 18 Wend. 126. This case was decided both in the supreme court, 17 Wend. 285, and in the court of errors, upon the ground that the statute of the state had expressly made the corporation responsible, and not upon the ground of any common law liability. The decision stands alone, and in the language of the Supreme Court of California, in Dunbar v. San Francisco, 3 Cal. 358, "without some provision in the charter, or some statutory enactment imposing the liability upon the city, I do not see how that decision can be sustained."

In Taylor v. Plymouth, 8 Met. (Mass.), 462, which was an action to recover, against the town, for a building torn down to stop a fire, C. J. Shaw says: "In order to charge the town, the remedy being given by statute only, the case must be clearly within the statute. Independently of the statute, the pulling down of a building in a city or compact town, in time of fire, is justified upon the great doctrine of public safety, when necessary. * * * But if there be no necessity, then the individuals who do the act shall be responsible. This is the more reasonable, as the law has vested an authority in the proper officers to judge of that necessity. But the town is responsible by force of the statute only, and such responsibility is confined to the cases specially contemplated. In support of the same doctrine of the non-liability of the corporation in the absence of an express statute, see the following additional cases: Weightman v. Washington, 1 Black (U. S.), 49; Coffin v. The Inhabitants of Nantucket, 5 Cush. 269; Hafford v. City of New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297; Ruggles v. Nantucket, 11 Cush. 433; Parsons v. Pettengill, 11 Allen, 511; Surocco v. Geary, 3 Cal. 69; Burnhyser v. Evansville, 29 Ind. 187. See also cases cited in notes to Sec. 773, of Dillon on Mun. Corp. p. 732; and see also Ogg v. City of Lansing, Dec. term, 1872, 7 Western Jurist, 56, which was an action brought by the plaintiff against the city, alleging that in November, 1871, a man by the name of Sess was taken sick with small-pox in the city; that the city authorities took said Sess, and the house in which he was confined, under its charge and control, but neglected to take proper and ordinary precautions to prevent the spread of the disease; that Sess died; and the agents and servants of the city requested and directed the plaintiff, who was passing the house in which Sees died, to assist in taking the coffin, in which said deceased was deposited, from the house, without giving plaintiff any notice of the disease which caused the death, and without having cleansed the house or used any means to prevent the spread of said disease; that the plaintiff did so assist in removing said corpse, and soon returned to his own house, whereby the disease was communicated to two of his children, who died thereof. It was held that, although the statute conferred the power upon the city to establish a board of health, who had power to make regulations in relation to communication with houses when there was any contagious or infectious disease, to establish pest houses or hospitals, and when deemed expedient and necessary to prevent the spread of any contagious disease, to remove to the pest-house or hospital any person sick with any such disease, to prohibit communication or intercourse with such houses, etc., and to employ persons to carry into effect all the rules and regulations made by the board, etc., the city was not liable for the alleged negligent conduct of the persons thus employed in the hospital. It was held to be the "true doctrine that the powers conferred upon the corporation are of a legislative and governmental nature," for a defective execution of which the city could not be made liable in a common law action.

In the case before us, the statute (Rev. § 1057), authorizes municipal corporations to "protect the property of the municipal corporation and its inhabitants." Section 1058 empowers them to make "regulations for the purpose of guarding against danger from accidents by fire." Section 1071 confers the power upon the city "to make and publish, from time to time, by-laws or ordinances, not inconsistent with the law of the state," for carrying into effect the powers conferred, and makes it the duty of the corporation "to make and publish such ordinances or by-laws as shall be necessary to secure the corporation from injuries by fire," etc. And by section 1096, the corporation is authorized to establish a city watch or police, and organize the same in such manner as will most effectually secure the inhabitants from personal violence and their property from fire and unlawful depredation, to establish and organize fire companies and provide them with proper engines and such other instruments as may be necessary to extinguish fire and preserve the inhabitants of the city from conflagration, and to provide such by-laws and regulations for the government of the same as they shall deem expedient."

We will not stop to determine whether these statutory provisions do or do not confer authority upon the city to pass the ordinance under which plaintiff's property was destroyed, for if they do not confer such authority, the city in its corporate capacity could not be made liable for the unauthorized act of any of its officers; the ordinance would be void, and would confer no authority on the mayor or other officers to do the act complained of, and the city would not be liable therefor. See Dunbar v. San Francisco, supra, and cases cited on p. 356. If, on the other hand, the ordinance is valid and authorized, the mayor to judge of the emergency and do, what, by the common law, any individual might do, at his peril, without a statute, upon cases cited, the city is not liable for the consequences of his acts in the absence of a statute creating such liability.

II. It is insisted by appellant's counsel, that the destruction of plaintiff's buildings, where there was no necessity to do so to arrest the progress of the fire, was a taking of private property for public use, and having been taken by appellee in pursuance of the ordinance and statutes referred to, the plaintiff is entitled to compensation from the city.

There are several satisfactory answers to this position: First. The power of eminent domain is vested in the state, and can be exercised by it alone, either directly or by the corporation or persons to whom it is delegated by the legislature; the purpose must be a public one and specified in the act delegating the power, and the power must be strictly pursued. See cases cited in notes to sections 467, 468 and 469, of Dillon on Municipal Corporations. There is nothing in the statutes of the state conferring the power of eminent domain upon the cities of the state, except for the purpose of laying off, opening, widening, straightening, etc., streets, alleys, public grounds, wharves, landing places, and market places; revision sections 1064, 1065, 1066, 1067. These sections of the statute confer upon the corporations the right of eminent domain for these purposes, and make provision for compensation to the owners of property to be taken under the power. The power is not conferred for any other purpose, and consequently can only be exercised for the purposes authorized. Second. If it be conceded that the destruction of buildings at the discretion of the mayor or other officer of the city, when a fire is in progress, is a taking of private property for public use, then it is beyond question that the statutes and the ordinance of the city, before referred to, do not confer any authority upon the city or any of its officers or other person to so destroy buildings or other property, and even if the statute, in express words, professed to authorize such destruction when deemed necessary by an officer of the city, no authority to do so would be thereby conferred. The statute would be null and void, because in direct conflict with section 18 of article 1 of the constitution. Any statute professing to authorize the taking of private property for public use without first making, or securing to be made, a just compensation therefor, would be invalid and confer no power whatever to take such property. There is no provision in the statute of the state providing for making compensation for property destroyed in cities for the purpose of preventing the spread of fire, consequently, if such destruction be an exercise of the power of eminent domain, it follows conclusively, that such destruction is not authorized by the law. Not only so, but if the destruction of buildings or other property for the purpose of preventing the spread of fire in a city or town, under the direction of some officer of the corporation upon whom is conferred an authority to judge of the emergency, be a taking of private property for public use, within the meaning of the constitutional provision before referred to, then the legislature cannot authorize such destruction, for, by the constitution, compensation is required to be first made or secured, before the property can lawfully be taken, which would be utterly impracticable in cases of fire in compact cities.

Third. In addition to the reasons above given, the great weight of judicial authority holds that the destruction of property, under authority conferred by law upon officers of municipal corporations, is not an exercise of the power of eminent domain, but is a regulation of the right which individuals possess to destroy private property in cases of inevitable necessity to prevent the spreading of fire, or other great calamity. The following cases hold that the destruction of property, under such circumstances, is not the exercise of the right of eminent domain: Russell v. Mayor, etc., of N. Y., supra; The American Print Works v. Lawrence, 3 Zabriskie, 595, 615; McDonald v. City of Red Wing, 14 Minn. 38, 41, 42; Stone v. Mayor, etc., of N. Y., 25 Wend. 172, 173, opinion of Senator Verplank; Surocco v. Geary, 3 Cal. 69, 73, 74; Dunbar v. The Alcalde, etc., of San Francisco, supra. The following cases, while they do not expressly decide, they support the same doctrine: Taylor v. Plymouth, 8 Met. 462, 465; The Mayor, etc., of N. Y. v. Lord, 18 Wend. 126; Conwell v. Emrie, 2 Carter (Ind.), 35.

While there are to be found in the opinions of judges in some cases, expressions leading to a different view, we have found no case directly holding a doctrine different from that of the cases above cited on this point.

We find no authority, either in the adjudged cases or in legal principles, upon which to hold the municipal corporation liable for the act of the mayor in ordering the destruction of plaintiff's buildings. The judgment of the circuit court, in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition, must be affirmed.—[The Western Jurist.

Bankrupt Act—Payment by Insolvent Husband of Premiums on Life Insurance Policies for Benefit of Wife.

IN RE BEAR & STEINBERG, BANKRUPTS.

In the District Court of the United States, for the Southern Distict of Mississippi.

Before Hon. R. A. HILL, District Judge.

1. Legal Title to Life Insurance Policy.—The legal title to a policy of insurance on the life of a husband, taken out by him for the benefit of his wife, is in the wife.

2. Payment of Premiums.—The value of the policy depends upon the premiums being paid as they fall due. The wife may pay them from her own means—or, they may be advanced by a friend, other than the husband.

3. ——. When Husband may Advance Them.—If reasonable in amount, as compared with his estate and liabilities, and if he is solvent at the time, the husband may advance them.

4. ——. ——. Valid as to Subsequent Creditors.—Advances by the husband, in that behalf, are certainly valid as to subsequent creditors.

5. When Legal Title to Policy of Insurance is not Assignable by Husband.—When so held by the wife, the legal title is not assignable by the husband, either at law or in equity.

6. Payment of Premiums by Insolvent Husband a Fraud upon Creditors.—Any payment of premiums made by a husband after he has become insolvent, is a fraud upon his creditors, whether so intended or not, and his assignee in bankruptcy may recover from the wife the amount so advanced, with interest, from the proceeds of policy when paid, the claim for which he may sell when it is ascertained, and the purchaser will acquire the contingent right to it.

7. Procedure in Bankruptcy—Register to take Proofs, Sell, etc.—The register in bankruptcy is ordered to take proof of amounts paid by the bankrupts, if any, after they become insolvent, and out of what fund, individual or partnership; which claim, when ascertained, the assignee shall sell for cash, in like manner as other debts, or choses in action are sold.

Harris & George, solicitors for creditors; Wharton & Johnstons, for bankrupts.

HILL, J.—This case is now submitted upon the exception of the creditors to the schedules of the bankrupt, upon the ground that they do not contain, and the bankrupts have not surrendered therein, a life policy taken out by each for the benefit of his wife. The question, upon examination, I find one of no little difficulty, and have postponed its decision for the purpose of obtaining all the light on the question attainable; but as it may be important to the parties in interest to have it settled without further postponement, I proceed to its examination. It is admitted that the policies are upon the lives of the husbands for the benefit of their wives; this being so, the question is, to whom do they belong? I am inclined to the opinion that the legal title is in the wife, and not the husband. The value of the policy depends upon the payment of the premiums as they fall due. This may be done by the wife out of her own means, or may be advanced by a friend other than her husband; if advanced by the husband it is but an advancement, settlement, or provision made by him for her benefit, out of his estate, which if solvent at the time the advance was made, he could do without any violation of the rights of creditors; provided it was reasonable in amount when considered in connection with his estate and liabilities; and certainly would be valid as to subsequent creditors; indeed a suitable provision for one's household is not only not condemned, but sanctioned by law, both human and divine. I am of opinion that the title to a life policy of the kind mentioned, both legal and equitable, is in the wife, and cannot be controlled or assigned by the husband.

It is otherwise, when taken out by him for his own benefit, or for the benefit of his estate, as in the case of Catchings v. Manlove, 39 Miss. 655, cited by creditor's counsel; hence the necessity of the assignment to his wife and children in that case, which being made when the husband was insolvent, was properly declared void as against his creditors, but was valid as against other parties.

Whilst I am satisfied the policies in the case now submitted belong to the wives of the bankrupts, and are not subject to be surrendered by the bankrupts, yet any payments which they may have made out of either their individual or partnership effects after they became insolvent, was a fraud, whether so intended or not, so far as to entitle the assignee to recover from the wife the amount advanced, with interest, out of the policy when it shall have been paid, and this claim, when ascertained, may be sold by the assignee, and will pass the contingent right to the purchaser. The case of Erben, referred to by counsel, was a claim upon the part of the bankrupt for whatever interest he had in the policy to be set off as exempt under the statute of Pennsylvania, which was allowed, which, if it was property in the sense of the statute, was properly set off, and did not raise the question as between the creditors and right of the wife, and is not authority upon the question now presented.

The other cases referred to by the distinguished and able counsel of the creditors will be found when closely examined, I am of opinion, not in conflict with the conclusion above stated. The register will take proof as to the amount paid by the bankrupts, if any, after they became insolvent, and out of what fund paid, which claim, when ascertained, will be sold for cash by the assignee, as provided for the sale of other debts or choses in action.

Divorce—Denial of Matrimonial Intercourse.

STEELE v. STEELE.

Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, General Term, April, 1874.

A husband cannot maintain a suit for divorce solely on the ground that his wife has denied matrimonial intercourse to him.

The plaintiff filed a bill in this case for a divorce from the defendant, his wife, on the ground of desertion. The desertion complained of, is that the defendant withdrew from his bed, and denied him matrimonial or sexual intercourse; that he continued to remain in the same house with the defendant for a considerable time thereafter, and then removal to another house, whither the defendant did not go; that subsequently the complainant requested the defendant, through a friend, "to live with him again as his wife," and she replied that "he could come and live in the house, but she would not live with him as his wife, i. e., she would have no matrimonial intercourse with him."

The bill prayed for divorce a vinculo matrimonii, on the ground of desertion.

The proofs established that the complainant and defendant were lawfully married in September, 1865, and that there were —— children from the marriage, and that the defendant had assigned, as a reason for denying matrimonial intercourse to the complainant, that she did not desire to have any more children.

The case was submitted upon bill and testimony to the Court below, and a decree was made dismissing the bill. The case is now here on an appeal from that decree.

W. P. Peirce, for complainant, made the following points:

The plaintiff maintains that he is entitled to a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, under an act of Congress, approved June 1, 1870, and asks that the decree dismissing the bill be reversed on the following grounds:

1. That the withdrawal of the defendant from the matrimonial bed of the plaintiff, for the uninterrupted space of two years, was desertion within the meaning of the statute.

See Bishop, Mar. & Div., 3d Ed., Sections 506, 510; Browning Laws, Mar. Div., page 113, &c.

2. That the removal of the plaintiff from the house in which they were domiciled, being the natural and intentional result of the defendant's conduct towards him, constitutes desertion on the part of the defendant.

See Hodges v. Hodges, 1 Esp. 441; Camp v. Camp, 18 Texas, 528; Greenl. Ev., Sec. 18, &c.; Bishop Mar. & Div., 3d Ed., Sections 517, 525; Schouler's Dom. Rel., 1st ed. 54.

3. That the subsequent refusal of the defendant to domicile with the plaintiff "as his wife," and also the fact that she now remains in a sepaate domicile, the result of no wrong on the part of the plaintiff, constitutes desertion on the part of the defendant.

See Bishop Mar. & Div., 3d Ed., Sections 728, 514; Kent's Com., 8th edition, 2d volume, 174.

No appearance for defendant.

The Court were of opinion that the statute in regard to divorce did not confer authority upon the Court to decree a dissolution of the bonds of matrimony, on the grounds set up in this case.

The Chief Justice, while concurring in the judgment, expressed the opinion that a denial of the marital right of intercourse, when continued for a period of two years, should be regarded as a desertion within the meaning of the statute, unless such denial was made in consequence of inability from sickness, or other sufficient cause in good faith.

Order appealed from affirmed.

Coming next to the considered decisions of judges sitting in banc, or in courts of first instance in chancery, we find that the principles regulating the authority of such decisions are well settled. An erratic judge will sometimes overleap the bounds imposed by the comity of courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and run amuck against the decisions of other judges of equal authority. But apart from this, it may be laid down as one of the rules observed by all judges of first instance, that the latest decision upon a litigated question, is the one followed in subsequent cases involving the same point. The language of Martin, B., in Reg. v. Robinson, L. R., 1 C. C. 80, indicates this general principle. He observes as follows: "When a point has once been distinctly raised and decided in a reported case, I, for my part, regret to find such a question criticised and disputed over again. When a point has once been clearly decided, I think it is far better to acquiesce in the decision, unless it can be brought for review before a higher court." And this submission to a prior decision will, in ordinary cases, be observed, even though the judge deciding the latter case does not approve of the case he follows, as was done by Lord Selborne, sitting for the Master of the Rolls, in Pike v. Dickinson, 21 W. R. 862.

If, however, the latest decision is at variance with earlier cases, and they are not cited or considered therein, then it very much affects the value of such a decision. Earlier conflicting decisions being thus overlooked, the judges have generally felt themselves at liberty to disregard the later cases, if such earlier ones are more numerous or more satisfactory to their minds. Thus, in Gillan v. Taylor, 21 W. R. 823 (a case of charitable gift), Wickens, V. C., remarks: "I have unwillingly come to the conclusion that I am bound by the case of the Attorney-General v. Price, 17 N. S. 371, and Isaac v. Dr. Friez, Ambl. 575. It is remarkable that those cases were not considered by Vice-Chancellor Wigram, in Lily v. Hey, 1 Hare, 580, and of course one must treat Vice-Chancellor Wigram's decision with the greatest respect. If the Attorney-General v. Price, and the other cases I have mentioned, had been before Vice-Chancellor Wigram, in Lily v. Hey, I should have followed the more recent decision. As it is, I am not entitled to dissent from authorities so much in point." See also for an application of the same holding, Coote v. Whittington, 21 W. R. 837, and Rowsell v. Morris, 22 W. R. 67, where Sir George Jessel, M. R., refused to follow Coote v. Whittington.

Malins, V. C., may not unfairly be classed as one of the erratic judges above alluded to. He deals with the question we are considering in his own peculiar style, as reported in Ferrier v. Jay, 23 L. T. N. S. 302. "This point," he says, "has been before two learned judges, whose decisions are in direct opposition to one another. On the bulk of the authorities, I am bound to follow the latter of the two decisions. Although all the authorities do not appear to have been cited in that case, I must assume that the Vice-Chancellor had them all in his mind when he made that decision."

Of the Irish Bench, Lord Justice Christian may be taken as one of the most illustrious types of the judicial Ishmaelite that the annals of the law can exhibit. His views upon this subject are given in Re Tottenham's Estate, Irish R. 3 Eq. 528: "When the decision of one court is cited to another of co-ordinate authority, the latter has a right to regard it in a critical, and even sceptical spirit; and while accepting the decision, to decline the reason of deciding, if a better one can be assigned. But I confess, I think that when an inferior court (I mean inferior in the sense of curial procedure) has before it the decision of its non-appellate tribunal, it is the duty to conform itself frankly and loyally to the reason of the decision, and not merely to its letter."

The decision of a co-ordinate branch of the court, or of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, will be followed till reversed on appeal, in order to avoid an unseemly conflict of decisions: Per James, V. C., in Re Times Assurance Co. 18 W. R. 404, and see also Re Hotchkiss' Trusts, L. R. 8 Eq. 643. In Boon v. Howard, 22 W. R. 541, Keating, J., is reported to say: "There is no positive rule which precludes the court from examining its previous decisions, though those are to be departed from only on the strongest grounds. The court ought to respect its own decisions and those of other courts."

In Owen v. London R. Company, 17 L. T. N. S. 210, Cockburn, C. J., held, that as the authorities were somewhat divided, the courts were entitled to exercise their own independent judgment on the question to be decided. In such a conflict of authority, the earlier decision was followed by Romily, M. R., in Hall v. Bushill, 12 Jur. N. S. 243. But in making a choice among conflicting decisions, the considerations which ought to influence the court are well expressed by Mr. Justice Jebb, in Loveland Coyne v. Bartley, Alc. & Nap. 308: "When the court is obliged to decide upon conflicting decisions, and one of them is of late date, of unquestionable authority, and is adopted by compilers and text and elementary writers of character, and is also in accordance with the opinions of the bar, so far as we can collect it from a series of authorities and precedents, we should not be warranted in making a decision contrary to that opinion."

A New Solution of the Railroad Question.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I believe your courtesy will allow me space to reply to your answer to my strictures upon the "New solution of the railroad question." To a part of it I shall not attempt to reply, because it is evident that the chief difference between us is one of political rather than of municipal law, and a discussion of that difference would be burdensome to you and unprofitable to your readers. I would venture to suggest that you seem to be in favor of what is called a "liberal construction" of the constitution and of public law, and are opposed to what you style "nice legal barriers;" while I cannot help believe that such construction leads to the grossest injustice, and that "legal barriers" form the only safeguards of liberty and property. When ours ceases to be a government of law, with its legislatures as well at its courts controlled by written constitutions and old common law notions of private rights, which have prevailed for centuries, its usefulness will have departed.

It may be that an individual who builds a train of cars for traffic on a railroad, and has the tracks condemned for the use of his train in rivalry of and against the will of the owners of the road, will represent the public thereby, but the argument is not satisfactory to me. Still, I will not dispute it, and must admit that it is very ingeniously urged. But, when you make the negro boy who drove his team across some one's field, when the highway was out of order, represent the public, I humbly submit that you will call upon old Chancellor Kent in vain, if you seek to justify upon the right of "eminent domain." You say, "the first illustration of the right of eminent domain given by Chancellor Kent, is": "if a common highway be out of repair a passenger may lawfully go through an adjoining private enclosure." 2 Kent Com. 338. So he says, but he cites it as an illustration of a principle entirely different. In the note to this sentence, he adds: "So, an entry upon another's land may be justified in cases of overruling necessity, or to recover properety carried on another's ground by the force of the elements." He styles these "the right of a public necessity." He adds: "These are cases of urgent necessity, but private property must in many other instances yield to the general interest. The right of eminent domain or inherent sovereign power gives to the legislature the control of private property for public use and for public use only." He then speaks of the need of compensation in such cases. The right of passage over adjacent land, when the highway is out of order, is as different from the right of eminent domain as that is from the right of police. The right of eminent domain requires compensation. The right of passage does not. In the one case you condemn the property by fixed legal proceedings. In the other you act at once without leave or license from anybody. You cross the field, and no matter what the injury, if it be unavoidable, it is damnum absque injuria. If your hat blows off and lodges in your neighbor's apple tree, you may get it without any compensation to him, and although it is the hat of an "individual" and not of the public. Your house may be pulled down to prevent the spread of fire, but that is not an exercise of the right of eminent domain. It is the right of police or self-preservation, and no compensation follows at common law.

If the needs of the public are not answered by the existing railroads, you may condemn land for another, but I submit, with great deference, that by principles and charters as old as Runnymede, reiterated over and over again in England and in this country, you cannot take the road already built—and why?—simply because it is evident that the public need does not require it. You can build another alongside, and your ability to do that disproves your right to take this. I also deny that there is any principle under which the employees of a railroad could, in time of peace, be made to operate the train of a rival. The "police power" sometimes knocks down peaceable citizens, but it has never yet discovered any way to make them go to work in invitum, except in the chain gang.

The old chancellor was not unwilling to have a government which some of us would think too strong, but he had a just respect for the rights of property, and he said in the same chapter from which you quote, "It undoubtedly must rest, as a general rule, in the wisdom of the legislature to determine when public uses require the assumption of private property; but, if they should take it for a purpose not of a public nature * * or if they should vacate a grant of property or of a franchise under the pretext of some public use or service, such cases would be gross abuses of their discretion and fraudulent attacks on private rights, and the law would clearly be unconstitutional and void."

Chancellor Walworth, in 5 Paige, 159, eloquently vindicates the rights of the owners of property. From that and other cases which have been carefully considered by learned courts, it is evident that the use for which private property is to be taken must be really a public use, and that there must be some substantial need of taking the identical property sought. If the public could build another railroad on the desired route, or near it, such need would not exist and the proceedings would be in violation of law and void.

I fear I am presumptious in opposing the views of the editors of the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, but the principles involved are important; some other people think as I do, and if we are running our train on the wrong track we ought to be switched off. T. G.

DENVER, COL.

REMARKS.—1. After considering the subject more attentively than before, we do not see any reason to modify any of the views previously expressed by us on this question. Our correspondent lays much stress upon the fact that Chancellor Kent, in using the illustration of the passenger going over the land of the private owner, when the highway was out of repair (2 Kent Com. 338), was illustrating "the rights of public necessity," and not the inherent sovereign right of eminent domain. We continue to think that there is no substantial difference between the "rights of public necessity," so far as concerns the assumption of private property for public purposes and the right of eminent domain. For the latter right is founded upon public necessity or public convenience, and is not, as its name would indicate, an ultimate right of property in the sovereign, but merely the right of appropriating private property for the public purposes, whenever an exigency shall arise demanding it. Bynk. Quæst. Jur. Pub. lib. 2, c. 15; Heinec. El. Jur. et Nat. lib. 2, c. 8, s. 168, n; Vattel, c. 20, § 34. The name itself (dominum eminens) was an invention of Grotius; but the principles on which the right rests were understood long before his time, and were understood (though, perhaps, imperfectly) by the early writers and judges of the common law, who, however, do not designate it by this name. It is believed that the word eminent domain cannot be found in the text of Blackstone's Commentaries, and the writer does not remember to have seen it in any of the earlier judgments of the English courts which Mr. Broom has collected to illustrate the doctrine that private right must yield to public necessity, under the maxim salus populi suprema lex. Broom Leg. Max. 1. Nor do we perceive any force in the position taken by our correspondent, that in the case of the use or destruction, by the public, of private property, through necessity, as in case of a highway out of repair, or property destroyed to prevent the spread of fires, compensation need not be made; whereas the exercise of the right of eminent domain must always be attended with compensation to the private owner. For, while we admit that this distinction is taken in some cases, and notably in one which we elsewhere print in this number, yet we do not perceive how our correspondent's argument derives any advantage from it. For the "public necessity," which will justify the taking of private property without compensation, clearly will justify such taking when adequate compensation is made.

2. Our correspondent submits, that while we may condemn land for another road, yet by principles and charters as old as Runnymede, reiterated over and over again in England and in this country, we cannot take the road already built, and simply because it is evident that the public good does not require it. "You can build another alongside," he adds, "and your ability to do that disproves your right to take this." We think this proposition carries within itself a direct contradiction. If "the public good does not require it," how can you condemn the lands of private owners to build a new road parallel with one already built? If the railroad corporation can say "you cannot take our road because you can build another," the land-owner can say, with equal force, "you cannot take my land to build a new road, because there is a road already built; go and take that." The rights of the adjacent land-owner and of the railroad-owner being, then, equal, considerations of public economy and convenience, and the generally conceded fact that it is against sound policy for governments to engage in the work of building vast internal improvements, when it can be avoided, would intervene and turn the scale in favor of taking the property of the railroad-owner. And this would be far better for him; for, through the payment of tolls from private train-owners, he would acquire an adequate and continuing compensation for the use of his property; whereas, a railroad owned and operated by the government, parallel to his, would result in a practical confiscation of his invested capital. In the face of such a powerful competitor, with the public treasury at its back, and not burdened by a bonded debt, he could not subsist—certainly he could not pay dividends on watered stock representing four or five times the cost of his railroad property.

3. We presume our correspondent does not mean to hint that the franchise of a private corporation may not be taken for public uses though the exercise of the right of eminent domain, as well as the property of private persons. If he does, we beg to refer him to the following cases: Piscataqua Bridge Co. v. New Hampshire Bridge Co., 7 N. H. 35; Crosby v. Hanover, 36 N. H. 420; Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston and Worcester R. R. Co., 23 Pick. 360; Central Bridge Corporation v. Lowell, 4 Gray, 474; West River Bridge v. Dix, 6 How. 507; Richmond R. R. Co. v. Louisa R. R. Co., 13 How. 81 (Grier, J.); Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Co. v. Baltimore and Ohio R. R. Co., 4 Gill & J. 1; State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 189; Red River Bridge Co. v. Clarksville, 1 Sneed, 176; Armington v. Barnet, 15 Vt. 745; White River Turnpike Co. v. Vermont Central R. R. Co., 21 Vt. 594; Newcastle, etc., R. R. Co. v. Peru, etc., R. R. Co., 3 Ind. 464; Springfield v. Connecticut River R. R. Co., 4 Cush. 63; Forward v. Hampshire, etc., Canal Co., 22 Pick. 462.

4. This being the undoubted law, it remains to enquire who shall judge (1) whether the use for which the property of the railroad-owner is sought to be condemned, is a public use; and (2) whether the public necessity justifies the taking.

(1.) Upon the first point we are willing to concede that there may be cases in which the courts may properly interfere, and declare, that the use for which the legislature has authorized property to be taken, is not a public use. Bankhead v. Brown, 25 Ill. 540; Olmstead v. Camp, 33 Conn. 531; Tyler v. Beacher, 44 Vt. 648; Loughbridge v. Harris, 42 Ga. 500. We freely concede that the courts will not permit the property of one man to be taken from him and given to another, under a mere pretext of benefiting the public, although adequate compensation be paid. Cooley Const. Lim., 531; Currier v. Marietta, etc., R. R Co., 11 Ohio State, 228; Gilmer v. Lime Point, 13 Cal. 306; Brunning v. N. O. etc., Co., 12 La. An. 541; Harding v. Goodlett, 3 Yerg., 41; Memphis Freight Co. v. Mayor, etc., 4 Coldw. 417; Clack v. White, 2 Swan, 549.

(2.) But the general proposition, nevertheless, remains true, that the question, whether there is a necessity which will authorize the taking, is a political and not a judicial question. The old chancellor was not far out of the way, when he said, "if the public interest can in any way be promoted by the taking of private property, it must rest in the wisdom of the legislature to determine whether the benefit to the public will be of sufficient importance to render it expedient for them to exercise the right of eminent domain, and to authorize an interference with the rights of private individuals for that purpose." As was said by Denio, J., in People v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 597, "the necessity for the taking of private property for the use of the public, or of the government, is not a judicial question. The power resides in the legislature." "The authority to determine, in any case, whether it is needful to exercise this power," says a living writer of even higher authority on this subject than Chancellor Kent, "must rest with the state itself; and the question is always one of a strictly political character, not requiring any hearing on the facts or any judicial determination. * * On general principles, the final decision rests with the legislative department of the state; and if the question is referred to any tribunal for trial, the reference and the opportunity of being heard are matters of favor and not of right." Cooley Const. Lim. 538. In support of these views the learned author cites People v. Smith, supra; Ford v. Chicago and N. W. R. R. Co., 14 Wis., 617; Matter of Albany St., 11 Wend. 152; Lyon v. Jerome, 26 Wend., 484; Hays v. Risher, 32 Penn. St. 169; North. Mo. R. R. Co. v. Lackland, 25 Mo. 515; Same v. Gott, Ibid., 540. In view of these authorities we apprehend that if the national, or a state legislature, should declare it a public necessity to condemn the property of a railroad-owner so as to make it a common highway for the benefit of the public, instead of the means whereby a few individuals perpetrate upon that public an outrageous and systematic extortion, no judicial tribunal would have the hardihood to say no.

5. We did not assert, nor intend to assert, that there is any principle by which the employees of a railroad company can, in time of peace, be made to operate the road of a rival. We did and do assert that it is a familiar principle that the paramount authority of the government extends to the commanding, when necessary, of the services as well as the property of its citizens. If our correspondent is not familiar with this principle, he must freshen up on the elementary writers. "His property, liberty and life shall," says Mr. Broom, "under certain circumstances, be placed in jeopardy, or even sacrificed, for the public good." But the necessity which will command, in invitum, the services of a citizen, must generally be a great public necessity, such as war, a great conflagration, flood or other public disaster. A familiar illustration in time of peace of this principle, is believed to be found in those laws which compel all able-bodied citizens, within certain ages, to work on the public roads, or other citizens with certain qualifications to serve on juries. And in England no qualified person could refuse the office of sheriff, on a similar principle; and this is the law in Tennessee to this day, although since the office has become lucrative, it is a dead letter. But this principle is obviously one which ought not to be extended in time of peace; and we do not think, and never have thought, that it could be extended so as to press into the service of a rival corporation, nolens volens, the employees of another. Nor would this be at all necesssary. Voluntary agents without number would present themselves as soon as adequate compensation was insured. Nor would it be necessary that these agents should be officers of the government, or paid out of the public treasury. The pilot who conducts an ocean steamer into New York harbor is paid by the vessel's owner or master; yet his conduct is strictly controlled by regulations established by Congress, designed to prevent collisions and preserve the lives of those who "go down to the sea in ships."

Notes and Queries.

CONFUSION OF MATERIALS—REPLEVIN

I. NEBRASKA CITY, NEB., Nov. 16, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I have for you or your readers a legal conundrum. B. purchased of A., who is a lumber merchant, a bill of lumber, and gave his promissory note therefor containing a clause "that the title to said lumber should not pass" from A. until payment of the note, but should remain in A. B. builds a house with said lumber, adding of course, nails and plastering upon the lands of C. with C.'s permission. The house is of course personal property, but can A. replevy the same, or proceed otherwise against it in rem? An answer with authorities is requested. E. F. W.

ANSWER.—There is a difference between articles which do not lose their identity, and lumber, brick, &c., which do lose their identity on being incorporated into a building. This principle is discussed in some of the cases relating to fixtures. Clearly in the case supposed, replevin cannot be maintained, and the right to enforce a lien in chancery is, to say the least, doubtful, but it is difficult to define in advance the conditions of equitable interference.

II. LARCENY—STATUTE.

WINCHESTER, ILL.

In Illinois, larceny is, by statute, defined to be "the felonious stealing, taking and carrying, leading, riding, or driving away the personal goods of another." Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 377, § 167. By the same statute (p. 395, § 292), it is provided that "all offences herein defined shall be prosecuted, and on conviction, punished as by this act prescribed, and not otherwise." The same statute (p. 377, § 168) provides the punishment for larceny as follows: "If the property stolen exceeds the value of $15, [he] shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than ten years; if the value of the property stolen is less than $15, he shall be confined in the county jail not exceeding one year, and fined not exceeding $100."

What would be the punishment, or could a man be punished at all, if found guilty of stealing property worth exactly $15? JAS. M. RIGGS.

REMARKS.—We see no substantial difficulty in the above statute, but we invite the attention of our readers to it. If the value of the goods stolen were exactly fifteen dollars, and the prosecuting attorney had any doubt about the construction of the statute, he could draw the indictment so as to charge the felonious taking and carrying away of goods of the value of fourteen dollars and ninety-nine cents, and proof of the stealing of goods of the value of fifteen dollars would be no variance. But we apprehend that if the indictment charged the stealing of goods worth exactly fifteen dollars, and the proof showed that fifteen dollars was the exact value of the goods stolen, there would be no difficulty in the case; the court would construe the stealing of property of the exact value of fifteen dollars to fall within the clause which punishes the stealing of property of a less value than fifteen dollars; for the greater includes the less. To hold that under such a statute the thief who has stolen exactly fifteen dollars may go unpunished, would be a sticking in the bark of the statute worthy of the nonsensical subtleties of a hundred years ago, but disgraceful to any court of justice of the present day. We apprehend that a court which, under an indictment for murder, could see that it was possible for three men at the same instant to strike a fourth with the same club, would have no difficulty in expounding the above statute, in case a thief were convicted under it of stealing a five and a ten dollar greenback, so as to punish the thief and protect society.

Book Notice.

SEDGWICK ON STATUTORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAWS. 2d Edition, with numerous additional Notes by JOHN NORTON POMEROY, LL. D., New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. 1874. pp. 692,

We are glad to welcome the second edition of this standard work. It has justly ranked, since its first appearance, as one of the best productions of American legal authors. No other single Treatise covers the exact ground occupied by it. Its object is to state and illustrate the Rules which govern the courts in the construction of Statutes and written Constitutions. When we consider how much of our law consists of positive or express provisions, constitutional or statutory, we at once realize the importance of a work on this subject. Indeed, no lawyer can afford to do without it. More than one half of Mr. Sedgwick's Treatise is devoted to statutes, and in this respect it treats from an American stand-point the same subjects so admirably considered in the excelent English work of Dwarris. In this respect its plan differs from that of the valuable treatise of Judge Cooley, on Constitutional Limitations. Strictly, only the last two chapters in Mr. Sedgwick is upon the same subjects to which Judge Cooley's work is devoted. The former work is the more elementary and philosophical; the latter the more intensely practical. The legal literature of America cannot afford to dispense with either, and we do not know, were we driven to the election, with which we would first consent to part.

One great charm of the work under reveiw, is the clear, elegant and flowing style in which it is written, In this respect it constantly reminds one of the first volume of Starkie on Evidence. In this respect, also, it is superior to the same author's work on the Measure of Damages. This is owing in part to the subject, but in a measure, also, we suspect to the circumstances under which it was written. We have heard that it was prepared by its author when left desolate by the loss of one deeply beloved, and to divert his mind from the pressure of his great grief. Accordingly, it is "Dedicated to the Memory of his Wife," and in his Preface he touchingly says "he takes leave of a task which has beguiled many hours of their weariness, and which has furnished a partial solace for the sadness of many others." In what an amiable light does this reveal the lamented author. It endears him to us.

The editor's work has been well and thoughtfully done. He leaves Mr. Sedgwick's text intact—and puts his own labors in the form of Notes, which bring the subject discussed down to date. The extent of the editor's additions is indicated by the fact that over 2,500 cases are cited in his notes, and yet the work is kept in manageable limits. Again we thank Messrs. Baker, Voorhis & Co., for their excellent edition of this valuable work.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Albany Law Journal, for November 21, contains an article on survivorship between husband and wife, in which several New York cases are collected; also an extract from the address of David Dudley Field, before the New York Mercantile Library Association, on the Law and the Legal Profession; also an extract from the Solicitors' Journal, on Some Recent Decisions in Private International Law; also the opinion of an English county judge, from the London Law Journal, on Railway Unpunctuality; together with its usual abstract of New York decisions, notes on current topics, notes of cases, etc.

The Pittsburgh Legal Journal, for November 18, publishes several opinions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. We note the following:

Schell et al. v. Stein: A deed regularly acknowledged or proved, and recorded in the proper book, and indexed in the separate index appropriated to the book, but not in the general index of all the deed books, is not defectively recorded.

Bell and Weir v. Reed: No one will be permitted so to excavate his land as to do a permanent injury to the land of his adjoiner, when such adjoiner's land is in its natural condition, or the injury thereto would result notwithstanding and without artificial pressure thereon.

The Chicago Legal News, for November 28, publishes an elaborate opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by Mr. Justice McAllister, in Hewitt v. Long, which was a contest between a father and mother for the custody of their minor child. The nature of the case is thus explained by the editor of that journal: "Before the child was born, the father deserted the mother and went off to Iowa. She obtained a divorce on the ground of desertion, and a decree for the custody of the child, in the Cass County Circuit Court. The father married again in Iowa, and became rich. The child, Alice, being about fourteen years of age, the father, on petition, against the wishes of the child, had the decree so modified as to give him the custody of the child, and allow him to remove her to Iowa. The mother appealed. The court discusses the common law rights of fatherhood, the statutory and natural rights of the mother, and the rights of the child whom it was sought to take from the mother and remove to another state, against her will. It was said by the learned judge, in delivering the opinion, that Alice, having been born in this state, she owes natural allegiance and has certain independent personal rights. The laws and customs of this state are her birthright. It is by those laws and the circumstances of her parents that she became a ward of the court, and as such entitled to its protection and superintendence over her welfare, and that she cannot be removed from this state against her will. Breese, C. J., dissents from this opinion of the court, and delivers an elaborate opinion, in which Sheldon, J. concurs. We shall publish this opinion in our next."

In also publishes a decision of Mr. District Judge Blodgett in the case of Reed, a bankrupt, holding—

1. That a debt barred by the statute of limitations of the state where the bankrupt resides, cannot be proved in bankruptcy.

2. That less strictness of proof is required to establish a promise by the debtor before the bar of the statute has attached, than to prove a new promise after the debt has become barred.

Also an opinion of Mr. District Judge Morrill of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Texas, holding, that inasmuch as the applicant for a discharge in the case before him was a voluntary bankrupt, and has not assets equal to thirty per centum of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he was liable as principal debtor, and has not obtained the consent of one-fourth of his creditors in number and one-third in value, his application for a discharge must be refused.

Also an opinion of the Supreme Court of South Carolina, by Moses, Ch. J., holding that the city of Charleston has power to tax its own stock (whatever that is), and that it can tax its stock held by non-residents.

The Legal Intelligencer, for November 27, contains but two or three cases of the general interest. In Morse v. Worrell, Common Pleas of Philadelphia, before Paxson, J., it appeared that the plaintiff's trade-mark was "The Rising Sun Stove Polish," with vignette of the sun. Held, that defendants would no be restrained from using the words "Rising Moon," with vignette of the moon.

It publishes opinions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in the following cases: Burke v. Hammond: 1. Abandonment of realty will be presumed unless some indication be left in, or upon the property, of intention to return.

2. A continuous claim for twenty-one years and payment of taxes, raises a presumption of a grant from the warrantee.

James P. Hanna, Survivor of Ira B. McVay, v, Robert Wray: 1. In a proceeding against a surviving partner on a partnership liability, the plaintiff is incompetent to testify to transactions and conversations between himself and the defendant's deceased partner.

2. A judgment against such surviving partner, unless fraudulent, would bind in settlement between himself and the estate of his deceased partner.

3. Karnes v. Tanner, 16 P. F. Smith, followed.

The Legal Gazette, for November 27, prints the opinion of Mr. Justice Strong of the Supreme Court of the United Statet (delivered November 9th) in the case of the ship Belle of the Sea v. Johnson & Higgins. The following is the syllabus:

The captain of the ship Belle of the Sea, executed a bottomry bond, payable within ten days after the safe arrival of the ship at New York. Upon her arrival, the mortgagee took her into possession, and employed the libellants to take up the bottomry bond, to collect the freight, general average and insurance, and generally to transact the business of the vessel. This arrangement was assented to by the owner any charterer. The bond passed by assignment into the hands of the libellants. As the sums collected proved to be insufficient to pay the expenses of discharging the ship, &c., it was claimed by the libellants that they had the right to apply what was collected, 1st, for their commissions, necessary expenses, and disbursements made by them on account of the ship; 2d, to the discharge of the bottomry bonds. It was contended that they had surrendered these rights by agreeing to pay the bond, and thus discharge its lien, looking to the freight, the general average, and the insurance alone for reimbursement.

1. Held, that the evidence did not establish the fact of any such surrender.

2. That the rights claimed by libellants belonged to them, and that the decision of the court below in affirming those rights be confirmed.

For a report of this case in the court below, see 4 Leg. Gaz. 108.

We see nothing else of interest in this number of the Legal Gazette, except matter which we have already noticed as being in other periodicals.

—FORTY-THREE life-insurance companies have been compelled to suspend business during the last five years in the United States.

—THE safe burglary trial at Washington has ended in the acquittal of Williams, and in the disagreement of the jury upon Whitley and Harrington, indicted as conspirators.

—THE newly elected members of the Supreme Court of Arkansas met on the 23d ultt., at Little Rock, in accordance with the provisions of the new constitution. The members drew lots for terms as follows: Chief-Justice English, 6 years; Associate-Justice Walker, 4 years; Associate-Justice Harrison, 4 years. Luke E. Barber was elected clerk and reporter of the decisions.

—PENSION OFFICE.—The commissioner of pensions has submitted his annual report to Secretary Delano. It gives a review of the business of the office up to include June last. It recommends that higher fees be paid examining surgeons, so that better talent can be commended. The amount of appropriation that will be required for the pension service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, will be $30,500,000. The commissioner again calls the attention of the secretary of the interior to the danger of destruction by fire to which the records of the office are liable in consequence of the exposure of the Seaton House to such an accident. He urges Congress should be reminded of the great risk to which these valuable records are exposed, to the end that a more suitable building be provided for the use of the office.

—PUBLICATION OF UNITED STATES REVISED STATUTES.—The text of these revised statutes, including the table of contents by chapters and subjects, marginal references and citations, is now in print. The work on the index, under the directions of Judge C. W. Jaines, is advancing as rapidly as possible, consistent with the degree of accuracy which is sought. This cannot be finished before January. Meantime it is proposed to furnish the courts, and many of the principal officers of the Government, with copies without an index, and the distribution of these incomplete volumes can begin at once. The index will be the most complete of any ever prepared by the government. It will cover 400 pages, and contain about 20,000 entries. The revised statutes contain 5,600 sections, and the minimum numbers of references in the index to each section is three, while in other instances they run as high as eighteen references to a section of fourteen lines. The index to Edmund's New York statutes contains about 32.000 entries.—[Daily Register.

Judges Emmons, Longyear and Withey will sit. This suit is brought by the Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Company to recover royalty for the use of vulcanized rubber amounting to upward of $7,000,000. It is a test case, and Dr. George Willis is the nominal defendant, although the suit is practically defended by all the dentists in the United States, some 15,000 in number, under the auspices of the Dental Protective Uninn of Michigan, of which Dr. B. CRIM. CON—EVIDENCE—COLOR OF CHILD'S HAIR.—A point was raised in Petrie v. Howe, 4 N. Y. Sup. 85, which reminds one of the celebrated case of The Alms House v. Whistlo. The action was crim. con. The plaintifft after testifying that his wife was the mother of four children by him, and that after the alleged criminal intercourse she gave birth to a fifth, was asked what was the color of the hair of the first four children. The fifth child was present in court. It was held that this species of physiological evidence was not admissible, and because it had been received, a new trial was granted.—[Albany Law Journal.

—WE have already had occasion to note the loose manner in which criminal justice is administered in Scotland, We had occasion to note a case in which a man of some rank, in attempting to shoot a farm laborer accidently killed a horse, and was let off with a slight fine and reprimand. An exchange says: "In the Highlands of Scotland almost every crime except murder is regarded with comparative indifference, and criminals when convicted, frequently have the option of leaving the place, never to return, rather than being sent to jail. In the Orkney and Shetland islands, also, when persons are convicted, they are sent across the Pentland Firth, to the mainland of Scotland, as a punishment, whereas the same class of criminals in England would be transported or sent to penitentiaries.

—RUFUS CHOATE'S OPINION OF A DISTINGUISHED DEMOCRAT.—Some twenty-five years ago, while Mr. George Ticknor Curtis was still exercising the functions of a United States Commissioner, in the rural city of Boston—before he had sent back a fugitive slave, and had thereupon immigrated to this more congenial metropolis—Mr. Rufus Choate left his law office early on a November morning, to pass the day in taking testimony before Mr. Curtis, in a patent case. Returning to the office late in the dusky, chilly afternoon, after finishing the task, Mr. Choate threw his bag upon the table, and remarked in the hearing of his law partner, Mr. Joseph Bell, and the half a dozen young law students, who were all aware what he had been doing: "I consider Mr. George Ticknor Curtis the most unsatisfactory man, upon the whole, that I have ever known, and I wish that I may never set my eyes upon him again." Then walking wearily across the room to the fire-place, he stood for a few moments warming himself, before a pile of sea-coal which was blazing in the grate. With the increasing warmth of his body, the usual sweetness of his disposition seemed at last to return, and after a long pause, he broke the silence by the remark: "I do not know but I might endure to look at him from a window in a procession."—[From the Evening Post.

—POST OFFICE.—The Postmaster-General has just issued the following new decision: After January 1, 1875, if a weekly and monthly publication be mailed together in one wrapper the postage must be prepaid at the higher rate for monthly publications, i. e., three cents for each pound or fraction thereof. In reference to the proposition submitted by publishers of magazines asking permission to mail the January number of their respective issues in December, at the rates prescribed by the new law, the Postmaster-General decides that he has no authority in the matter, and that the January number can only be mailed in January, at the terms of the new law, or if mailed in December it must be subjected to prepayment at the office of mailing, or pay double transient rates at the office of delivery. The publishers will undoubtedly hold back the delivery of the January number until January. The use of sealed transparent envelopes for the transmission of matter of the third class is sanctioned by postal regulations. Under no circumstances should a postmaster tear the wrapper of any packet or package passing through his office. If he cannot determine the contents of a package passing at less than letter rates without destroying the wrapper, he should charge it up with letter postage, to be collected on delivery. A postmaster who goes outside of the delivery of his office to sell postage stamps, stamped envelopes, or newspaper wrappers, or who uses them for the purpose of discharging his private obligations, will be promptly removed if reported to the Post-Office department.—[Washington Chronicle.

—TOLEDO, Ohio, has a Guybord case. In the common pleas court which sits in that city, an injunction was recently applied for by John Wynn, against Rev. Jas. O'Reilly, pastor of St. Francis De Sales Catholic church, to restrain the latter from interfering with the burial of the body of Mrs. Mary Wynn, wife of plaintiff, in St. Francis De Sales cemetery at that place. It appears that the family of Mrs. Wynn own a lot in that cemetery, in which they desired to bury her; but after preparations for burial had been made, Wynn was notified by Father O'Reilly that he would oppose it, if necessary, by force. The remains were deposited temporarily in a vault in Forest cemetery where they now are, and Wynn applied for an injunction to prevent interference with the interment. Father O'Reilly in his answer, sets forth that the cemetery is under control of the bishop of the diocese of Cleveland, and that the rules of the Catholic church make it obligatory upon the bishop or his representative to refuse to permit to be interred therein any persons of whom full proof of membership is not furnished, and that they died in full communion; that Mrs. Wynn had, for a long time prior to her decease, ceased to be a member of the Roman Catholic church, and died out of communion. The court reserved its decision. Meanwhile the case of Guybord, involving the same question with reference to an excommunicated Catholic in Canada, has just been determined by the English Privy Council against the church, and the parish priest announces his readiness to go to jail rather than obey the mandate. Well, let him go. But is it not a little singular that Guybord himself, the man who, it should seem, would be, of all others, most interested, makes no complaint?

—MANY of the reports which come to us continue to have cases on breach of promise of marriage, and courts of original jurisdiction in England and the United States, are frequently called upon to try such cases. But there are many reasons why this species of action should be abolished. In France there has been much discussion of the subject. The declaration of November 26, 1639, art. 7, enacted that the courts should not receive proof of a promise of marriage, except in writing. The Code Napoleon was silent on the subject. Some French writers, as Toullier, Merlin and Rolland de Villeargues, are of opinion that promises of marriage are valid. But Pezzani, in his Empechements du Mariage, gives some strong reasons why no action should lie for damages for breach of promise. He contends that the enforcement of such a promise, when against the will of either party, would be against public policy; and that the original obligation being void, the accessory obligation of damages is void, on the principle that quod nullum est, nullum produicit effectum. Duranton was also opposed to allowing damages in such cases. If the sentiment of society will not deter individuals from resorting to courts for redress for breach of promise, the legislature ought to abrogate this remedy. Where parties are well acquainted with each other's circumstances, as they surely ought to be before entering upon so important an engagement, there is no sound principle of law which can sustain an action for the failure to perform an engagement of this character. If there is deceit or imposture on the part of either of the parties, there might be a remedy in another form; but there should not be a remedy as for the breach of the promise of marriage.—[Albany Law Journal.

—THE evidence of husband and wife, in criminal cases, still remains in that barbarous state from which this branch of our law has gradually become civilized, of late years, mainly through the influence of Bentham. The absurd theory of interested witnesses being incapable of giving evidence, is here, and here alone, maintained. The times when parties could not be called to prove their own case, are now some distance backward: but it was not until the Evidence Amendments Act, 1853, that husband and wife could be witness for, and against each other even in civil cases; and criminal cases were specially excepted. We have, then, this anomaly, which was curiously illustrated about a month ago in one of our police courts. One man summoned another for an assault, and the only witnesses present were the wives of each: the complainant could, and did, call his wife in support of his statement; but when the defendant, who said the other man struck the first blow, was going to call his wife, he was told that could not be done, because she was his wife. The astonished defendant thought this was hardly fair, and said so: while we may also think that the complainant's wife was as much an interested witness as the defendant's; and if the evidence of the one could be taken by the magistrate, with this allowance, so could that of the other. Moreover, who can be more deeply interested in the fate of a child than its father or mother? Yet they may be heard in its favor. If the present anomaly is founded on the idea that man and wife are one, then why was the concession made in civil cases? and the same answer applies if it is a remnant of the theory of interested witnesses being incapable. But if, as seems most likely, it is a relic of that curious state of the law when, although a man was in theory presumed innocent, small chance was left him to prove it, by not even allowing him counsel for his defence, then in the interests of justice and common sense, the sooner it is done away with, the better.—[The Law.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES ON BREACH OF CONTRACT TO CONVEY.—The well-considered and satisfactory opinion of Mr. Justice Wagner of the Supreme of Missouri, in Kirkpatrick v. Downing, which we print elsewhere, decides a point new in Missouri, and of general interest. Nothing could be added to the reasoning with which the learned judge sustains the principle laid down. The conclusion of the court conforms to the only philosophical principle governing the measure of damages for the breach of contracts in cases not attended with special circumstances of imposition or oppression—namely: that the obligee shall receive compensation for the actual loss he has sustained.

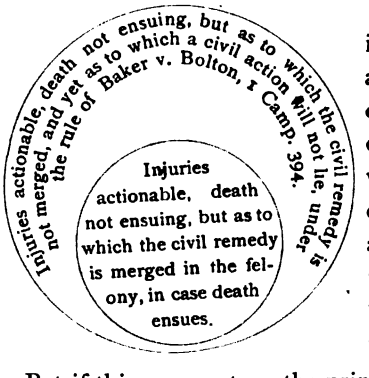
COUNTER-CLAIMS.—The suggestive article on this subject, which we publish elsewhere, will, we doubt not, attract the attention of our readers. It is written by Hon. Philemon Bliss, professor of pleading and practice in the law school of the state university at Columbia, Missouri, and lately one of the judges of the supreme court of this state. The appropriateness of his allusions to the admirable work on pleading under the New York code by Mr. Van Santvoord, and the general interest which attaches to the question, will be seen when it is considered that our statute on the subject is copied from that of New York, and has its counterpart in the codes of several other states. We take great pleasure in stating that Judge Bliss will contribute, from time to time to this journal, other articles on code pleading.

Right of Action for the Killing of a Human Being.

We ask the attention of our readers to a communication, in another column, from Dr. Hammond, of the University of Iowa, in which he reviews the recent opinion of Judge Dillon, in Sullivan v. The Union Pacific Railroad Company. Though brief, it is one of the best specimens of legal criticism it has been our privilege to publish; and it gives us sincere pleasure to welcome him again to our columns after a long silence.

Dr. Hammond shows that the principle declared by Lord Ellenborough, in Baker v. Bolton, 1 Camp. 493, and which has been generally adopted in this country, is the result of the extension of two of the principles of the ancient common law beyond their true limits. The first of these principles was that there could be no action for an injury which amounted to a felony, because the civil remedy was merged in the offence against the king. The second principle was that the right of action for a personal injury died with the injured person.

1. The doctrine of the merger of the civil remedy in the felony, and the reasons on which it rested, are thus concisely stated by Mr. Justice Bigelow, in Boston, etc., v. Dana, 1 Gray, 83: "By the ancient common law, felony was punished by the death of the criminal, and the forfeiture of all his lands and goods to the crown. Inasmuch as an action at law against a person whose body could not be taken in execution, and whose property and effects belonged to the king, would be a useless and a fruitless remedy, it was held to be merged in the public offence. Besides, no such remedy in favor of the citizen could be allowed without a direct interference with the royal prerogative. Therefore, a party injured by a felony, could originally obtain no recompense out of the estate of the felon." As long, therefore, as this ancient principle of the common law subsisted, it furnished a sort of reason why an action would not lie to recover damages sustained in the killing of a human being; since a killing, whether malicious or negligent, which would furnish a ground for the recovery of damages, would not ordinarily fall below the grade of involuntary manslaughter, and would hence be presumably felonious. But the rule was, as Dr. Hammond points out, insensibly extended beyond the boundaries of the reasons on which it rested. For in point of fact, there are many negligent homicides, where, in case death had not ensued, an action for damages would lie, and yet where the person who would be responsible in a civil action, would not, had death ensued, have been guilty of a felonious homicide. Thus, in the case of Sullivan v. The Union Pacific Railroad Company, although the particular employee or agent of the company, through whose negligence Sullivan's son was killed, may have been guilty of manslaughter, yet the corporation could not have been punished for that crime, although had death not ensued, they may have been liable to pay damages. Again: if a person were permitted to bring a civil action for an injury causing death, he could sustain his case by a preponderance of evidence; whereas, in a criminal prosecution, the king or the state would be obliged, in order to secure a conviction, to satisfy the jury of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. This difference between the rules of evidence applicable to civil and criminal cases, would include within the scope of its operation a very large number of cases. The boundaries, therefore, between injuries causing death, which, had death not ensued, would have been actionable, and those to which, death not ensuing, the common law doctrine of merger applied, may be expressed by the following diagram:



Injuries actionable, death not ensuing, but as to which a civil action will not lie, under the rule of Baker v. Bolton, 1 Camp. 394.
Injuries actionable, death not ensuing, but as to which the civil remedy is merged in the felony, in case death ensues.

It is thus seen that there is a large number of cases, among which are those which call into exercise the principle respondeat superior, which fall outside the reason on which the principle that a civil action will not lie for the killing of a human being when the death is instantaneous, is based.

But if this were not so, the principle would be inapplicable in the United States, because the doctrine of merger, on which it rests, has never had a foothold here. It has been generally repudiated by the American courts, and in those states where the courts have not repudiated it, it is believed to have been abolished by statute. Boston, etc., v. Dana, supra; Blassingame v. Glaves, 6 B. Monroe, 38; Ballew

v. Alexander, 6 Humph. 433; Story v. Hammond, 4 Ohio, 376; Robinson v. Culp, 1 Tread. 231; White v. Fort, 3 Hawks, 251; Pettingill v. Rideout, 6 N. H. 454; Cross v. Guthery, 2 Root, 90; Piscataqua Bank v. Turnley, 1 Miles, 312; Foster v. Commonwealth, 8 M. & S. 77; Patton v. Freeman, Coxe, 113; Allison v. Farmer's Bank of Virginia, 6 Rand. 223; Gen. Stats. Kansas (1868), p. 383, § 306; Code of Iowa (1873), p. 431, § 2526; 1 Stant. Ky. Code (1860), p. 371, § IV; 1 Wagn. Stat. Mo., p. 515, § 28; Voorhies' New York Code (1864), p. 19, § 7, etc., etc.; 2 Rob. Prac., 548, 549. But if this doctrine of merger were a part of our law, still it would have no application to a case like that of Sullivan v. The Railroad Company; for although a master is civilly responsible for injuries caused by the negligence of his servant, yet the servant alone can, as a rule, be punished criminally; and hence it is the action against the servant, and not that against the master, which would merge.

2. The other principle of the common law, out of which, as Dr. Hammond suggests, the doctrine of Baker v. Bolton sprung, is believed likewise to be repealed by statute in many of the United States. Code of Iowa (1873), p. 431, § 2525; Gavin v. Hord, Ind. Stat. (1862), § DCCLXXII, etc., etc. But where it is not repealed, it can have no application to the case of a master suing for damages caused by the killing of his servant, because it is the servant's right of action that abates with his death, and not that of the master. The latter sues in his own right, and not in the right of his servant, or as his representative.

It is thus seen that the doctrine which Judge Dillon repudiates rests upon two principles, one of which has become obsolete in American law, and the other partially so, and neither of which, if still a living principle, could have any application whatever to the case of a master suing for the damages sustained by himself in the killing of his servant. This was, then, a case in which the maxim might fitly be applied, cessante ratione, cessat ipsa lex. T.

Code Pleading—Counter-Claims.

I do not propose to discuss the subject of counter-claims in general, not even those "arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the petition, as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim"—for this clause can hardly be made plainer by explanation—but rather those that are authorized by the clause immediately following, to-wit: "or connected with the subject of the action." The statute (1 Wagn. Mo. Stat., p. 1046, § 13), thus authorizes a defendant to bring a cross action against the plaintiff, or set up, by way of counter-claim, any cause of action he may have against him which is connected with the subject of the plaintiff's action.

In commenting upon the phrase in this connection, Mr. Van Santvoord says, that "the words, subject of the action, should, perhaps, be construed, not as relating to the thing itself about which the controversy has arisen, but as referring to the origin and ground of the plaintiff's right to recover or obtain the relief he asks. Anything necessarily connected with it, that is, growing out of, or the direct result of the contract or the transaction which the plaintiff alleges as the ground of his demand, may, if a proper subject of cross action by the defendant, be set up as a counter-claim, but the defendant should be able to trace the origin of his right or claim to relief to the transaction itself, which furnishes the plaintiff his ground of action. * * * The conclusion drawn from this view of the case, is, that the words 'connected with the subject of the action,' as used in the section of the code under consideration, are used merely to qualify the words which immediately preceed them.'" p. * 565-6.

Is this the correct view? If so, the phrase can have but little significance, for the other clause expressly authorizes the defendant to counter-claim a cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the petition. Unless the additional claim authorize the defendant to bring his cross action against the plaintiff for a cause connected with the property in respect to which the plaintiff has brought his action, although it may have nothing to do with the contract or transaction set forth in the petition, if not surplusage, it, at most, can have but a limited application.

"The subject of the action," in a restricted sense, may be the same thing as "the contract or transaction named in the petition as the foundation of the action." In this sense, the lease is the subject of an action for rent reserved, and the same may be said of any instrument of writing upon which suit is brought. When the contract, upon which the petition is based, shows but a part of the real transaction, the construction given to the phrase by Mr. Van Santvoord may allow a counter-claim, relating to the part omitted, as to the consideration for the agreement sued on, when it is not expressed in the agreement, and when it need not be, set out in the petition. But in such case, as when the agreement is a promissory note, and the consideration is property sold, the subject of the action is the note, although, in a more enlarged sense, it is the property or the instrument conveying it. The Missouri decisions, as we shall presently see, sustain, in effect, the latter view, but there are cases where a defendant may have a cause of action against the plaintiff, which he would set up by way of counter-claim, that has nothing directly to do with an instrument upon which the plaintiff may have based his action, nor with its consideration—the petition, indeed, may not be founded upon a writing—and yet this defendant's claim does pertain to property rights in regard to which are involved in the suit. If rights in regard to property are so involved, why may not this property, in the liberal construction we are directed to give to the code, be regarded as the subject of the action? If the phrase is made only to comprehend what has before been indicated, to-wit: the contract or transaction set forth in the petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or the consideration of such contract, cases will arise when matters, that are neither one nor the other, may be so involved in the suit that they should be decided in the same action, that the defendant be not driven to an independent one. The provision in that respect should certainly be as liberal as the old chancery rule, and the phrase is broad enough to make it so.

If the property, the right to which, or some right growing out of, or in relation to which is involved in a suit, cannot be called the "subject of the action," it is often difficult to say, as distinguished from "the contract or transaction named in the petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim," what it may be. Mr. Van Santvoord says, that in an action for the recovery of real property, the possession is the subject of the action, but does not this confound the remedy, the judgment, whether for money or possession of property, with that to which the claim to such property relates, or upon which it is founded?

To illustrate the general view: The owner of land brings an action for possession against one holding under a contract of sale, may not the latter, by counter-claim, ask for a specific performance of the contract? Certainly not, in the restricted sense given to the phrase under consideration. In that sense, such a counter-claim can only be made when the suit is founded upon the contract the defendant would thus enforce as a suit for its recission. A naked claim for possession, founded upon title, has nothing to do with the contract; the latter, unless possession be given by, or be inferred from its terms, is not even a defence, and in such case the affirmative relief, of a judgment for specific performance, relates not to "the origin or ground of plaintiff's right to recover," nor is it necessarily connected with any contract or transaction upon which he bases his right, but only pertains to the land sought to be recovered. Yet this cross action is sustained upon respectable, if not binding, authority. Dewey v. Hoag, 15 Barb. 365.

In an action to enforce a lien, as an equitable mortgage, it is proper to bring in, as parties, all other lien-holders, especially subsequent ones, that the rights of all may be determined. Can it be doubted that such defendant lien-holder may counter-claim his own demand and ask for judgment in his favor, although it has no other relation to the plaintiff's than the fact that it rests upon the same land, and that he may obtain an affirmative judgment, even if the plaintiff should fail as to his own claim?

Or, one sues for payments due upon a contract for the sale of land, and the defendant answers that the plaintiff's title was defective, and that he was bankrupt, or, for other reasons, could not perfect it so as to make the purchaser a title when the eedd should become due. This would be matter of defence; and, to go farther and claim a return of the money already paid, would be a counter-claim arising out of the contract upon which the action was based. But suppose the defendant had, in the meantime, obtained title to the property and desired to remove the cloud arising from the colorable title of the plaintiff, could he seek this equitable relief by way of counter-claim? The action is founded upon the contract, but the counter-claim is not connected with that, but with the property, and it cannot be made unless the latter is the subject of the action.

Suppose, again, a promissory note be given for the rent of land, the landlord covenanting, by a separate instrument, to make repairs; in a suit upon the note, can the defendant counter-claim damages arising from the breach of this covenant? Or, the note is given for the price of a machine, the seller agreeing collaterally to replace it if the one sold proves defective, can the purchaser, when sued, counter-claim damages for not complying with the agreement? The counter-claim is not founded upon the contract upon which the petition rests, but each is the consideration of the other, and one may, perhaps, with more propriety, be said to relate to the subject of an action founded upon the other, than if it related to the property merely in respect to which the contract in suit was made. The right, in these cases, to make the counter-claim might be consistent with the view quoted above from Mr. Van. Santvoord.

The questions raised in most of the above supposed cases have not been passed upon by the Supreme Court of Missouri, nor do I find such an authoritative construction given to the phrase under consideration, as to indicate what its opinion would have been. There are several cases, however, where, in a suit upon a contract, the defendant was allowed to counter-claim damages in the nature of a recoupment, arising from a breach of another contract, or from an injury to property, which contract on property was the consideration of the contract sued on.

In Grand Lodge v. Knox, 20 Mo. 433, one who was sued for the purchase-money of land was allowed to counter-claim damages arising from the removal of fixtures by the seller, and in a similar case, when the purchaser was sued upon notes given for the purchase-money, he was permitted to counter-claim the value of a growing crop wrongfully removed by the seller. Gordon v. Bruner, 49 Mo. 570. There have been several cases in which it is held that a purchaser may, when sued for the purchase-money, whether evidenced by a promissory note or otherwise, set up by way of counter-claim, fraud and deception in the sale. House v. Marshall, 18 Mo. 368; Owens v. Rector, 44 Id. 389; Morse v. Rathburn, 49 Id. 91. McAdow v. Ross and Smallwood, 53 Id. 199, was a statutory proceeding by which the plaintiff sought judgment against defendant Smallwood, and an enforcement of a lien upon his house for lumber furnished defendant Ross, who built the house. Smallwood answered that the plaintiff had guaranteed that Ross should build the house according to a certain contract, which he had not done, and asked judgment against the plaintiff upon his guaranty. The court sustained the counter-claim, which is going a little further than the other cases, though not, perhaps, as far as some of those above supposed.

The proper construction of this phrase derives additional importance from the fact that it is used in describing causes of action that may be united in one petition. 1 W. S., 1012, § 2. Those that arise either out of "the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action," may be so united, and it is important to know whether the various transactions that become sources of controversies, must, in order to authorize their adjudication in one action, be connected with the same contract, or whether it will suffice, if they are connected with the property concerning which the disputes have arisen.

This is written rather to provoke enquiry, to call out opinions from such of your correspondents as have given special attention to code pleading, than as expressing any settled conviction upon the subject. B.

COLUMBIA, MO., Nov. 25, 1874.

—MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WAITE is thus described by a New York correspondent:

"Chief Justice Waite is the youngest man on the bench, and looks still younger than he is. With a solid and erect form and bearing, square and massive head, covered heavily with black hair, which years are mottling into gray; strong and expressive face, genial but decided manner on the bench, he looks the chief justice of the present, being clearly distinct from the ideal judge of the past, when white and scanty locks, a bald and glistening dome of thought, great age, and somewhat of coldness and reserve, marked the typical jurist."

Measure of Damages upon Breach of Contract to Convey Land.

Supreme Court of Missouri, October Term, 1874.

Present, Hon. DAVID WAGNER, WM. B. NAPTON, H. M. VORIES, T. A. SHERWOOD, E. A. LEWIS, Judges.

1. Vendor and Purchaser—Recoupment—Rents—Waste.—In a suit by a vendee against his vendor for damages, for failing to convey land according to contract, the vendor cannot have a recoupment on account of rents or waste.

2. ——. Measure of Damages on Breach of Contract to Convey.—Where a vendee sues to recover damages sustained through the failure of his vendor to convey land according to contract, the measure of his damages is the actual loss he has sustained; and this is the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the land at the time of the breach of the contract to convey.

The plaintiff, Kirkpatrick, filed his petition, in which he stated that on the 25th of August, 1857, the defendant, Downing, was owner in fee of 160 acres of land, which was therein described; and that on the same day Downing sold the same to Kirkpatrick for the sum of $3,200, and executed to him a title bond therefor. That Kirkpatrick paid in money and property $500 at the time, and gave his five several promissory notes for the payment of the balance, each for the sum of $540, and payable respectively, in one, two, three, four and five years; that, by the terms of the bond, Downing was to make a deed to the plaintiff upon the payment of the last note; that Kirkpatrick took possession of the land, and on March 1, 1859, with the consent of Downing, he sold forty acres of the land to Charles Hughes, for $1,200, which amount was paid by Hughes to Downing, and was to be credited on the indebtedness of the plaintiff; that plaintiff occupied and cultivated the land to some time in 1858, and paid $80 tax on it, and made lasting and valuable improvements thereon, costing $1,000, and cleared thirty-five acres of land, which was worth $700, and paid the promissory notes in full, and demanded of Downing a deed for the land, which he refused to make; and that he sold and conveyed the land to one Baker. That in 1864, whilst plaintiff was absent from home, Downing procured fraudulently from plaintiff's son a surrender of the title-bond, the son having no authority to give it up. The petition then prayed for judgment for $1,780, the value of the improvements made and amount of taxes paid, and also $3,200 purchase-money, with interest thereon.

In substance, the answer of Downing states that he was the owner of the said lands in fee simple; sold them to plaintiff at the price and upon the terms stated in the petition, and that he bound himself, upon the payment in full of the notes, to convey the title to the plaintiff. The answer denied the payment of the notes in full, and averred that, independent of the $1,200 paid by Hughes, plaintiff only paid $920, and that plaintiff and defendant agreed that the forty acres sold to Hughes should be conveyed by defendant to Hughes. It was admitted that plaintiff made some improvements, but it was denied that he ever made as much as was alleged.

There was a denial of any fraudulent procurement of the surrender of the title-bond. But it was alleged that plaintiff left home in 1864, his family residing on the land, and that they continued on it till 1865, and that plaintiff's wife was his agent during his absence; that in 1864 plaintiff's family were committing waste on the land, impairing defendant's security for the purchase-money, and that the defendant remonstrated with her about it, and that she said that she was authorized to rescind the contract, and produced a letter to that effect from her husband, and that the contract was then and there cancelled, and that the two remaining notes which were due, amounting, with interest, to about $1,900, were delivered to her by the defendant; that these notes, with the interest, were greater in amount than the value of the land, and that in pursuance of this cancellation, plaintiff's family left the land.

That afterwards, in 1865, defendant sold the whole 160 acres for $1,600, the full value of it at that time; and at the same time the 120 acres was not worth more than $900; that plaintiff and his family were in possession of the land from 1857 to 1865, cultivating the same and enjoying the crops, the use of the land being of the annual value of $400, which defendant prayed to have recouped; that, while in possession of the land, plantiff committed waste, cut away timber to the value of $500, which was also asked to be recouped.

All that part of the answer in reference to a sale of the land to another person for its full value, and the annual value of the rental of the land, and the waste committed by the plaintiff whilst in possession, was stricken out. The plaintiff then filed a replication to the new matter set up in the answer, and the cause was tried before the court and a jury, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for $2,676 60. It is unnecessary to notice any of the points made in relation to the admission or exclusion of evidence, as we have been unable to perceive any substantial error in the rulings of the court in that respect.

The evidence was conflicting in regard to the authority of the plaintiff's wife to deliver up the title-bond and rescind the contract, and the jury, by their verdict, evidently found that she possesses no such authority. That was a matter for them to determine on the testimony, and with their verdict we have no right to interfere. That part of the answer asking for a recoupment for the value of the rent and damages was rightfully stricken out. The relation of landlord and tenant did not exist in this case, and that is the only relation upon which the defence would have been available. The case of Coffman v. Huck (19 Mo. 435), is a direct authority for this proposition, and it was then held that a party who enters upon land as a vendee, cannot, upon a subsequent recission or breaking up of the contract of sale, be made liable for the rent of the land as a tenant. He is only liable to the extent of the benefit actually derived by him from the use of the land, in ascertaining which he may be allowed for all outlays in improvements.

But the only question of any real importance in this case, and upon which the decision must ultimately turn, is that in regard to the measure of damages. This is the only question that was presented with any prominence in the instructions of the court, and this will now be considered.

For the plaintiff the court gave the following declaration: "The jury are instructed that unless they believe from the evidence that the wife of the plaintiff was authorized by him to cancel and rescind the written contract for the conveyance of the land from defendant to plaintiff, and surrender the bond and receive the notes in pursuance thereof, and that said wife did not cancel and rescind said contract and deliver up said bond in pursuance of said authority given said wife by said plaintiff, they will find for plaintiff and assess his damage at the amount of purchase-money paid by plaintiff, with six per cent. interest thereon, from the time the same was paid until the present time."

At the instance of the defendant an instruction was given, that if the wife of the plaintiff was authorized to cancel or rescind the contract of sale, then the verdict should be for the defendant, but the court refused, at his request, to declare the law to be: "That if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the defendant acted in good faith in the sale of the land in question to Baker, and not with intent to injure or defraud plaintiff, then the measure of damages in the case is the actual damage sustained by plaintiff, and if the jury shall further believe from the evidence that at the time defendant sold said land to said Baker, that plaintiff was owing defendant therefor more than said land was worth in cash in the market, then the jury should allow nominal damages only."

are conflicting and inharmonious. That there are many cases of the very highest respectability sustaining the view taken by the court below, is unquestioned. In conformity with the decisions in both England and America, the courts in this state have held that the measure of damages on a breach of covenant of seizin is limited by the consideration-money and interest. Dickson v. Desire, 23d Mo. 166; Tong v. Matthews, Id. 437. The covenant of seizin is broken as soon as it is made. If, at the time of the execution of the deed, the grantor does not own the land, the covenant is broken immediately, and the rule for assessing the damages arising on this breach, is based upon the principle that, no land having passed by the vendor's deed to the purchaser, the purchaser has lost no land by the breach of the covenant—he has lost only the consideration he paid.

And many cases, as before remarked, have held this rule equally applicable to the case of a sale of land, when the vendor, for any reason, refuses to carry out his agreement and convey the title. As abundant authorities may be found, both for and against this rule, it is best to examine the question in the light of reason, and determine, if possible, what line of adjudication will most likely be promotive of the ends of justice. Mr. Sedgwick well remarks in his treatise on the measure of damages, that although courts have felt themselves bound, in some instances, as to real covenants, to adopt abitrary rules, still the constant effort is to give compensation for what is actually lost; not to allow remuneration for a mere technical breach of agreement, but to make the measure of damages correspond with the real injury sustained, and not to permit an action where no loss has been suffered. Sedg. Meas. Dam., 6th Ed. 194. A difference has been taken in some of the cases in regard to the good or bad faith of the vendor in failing to comply with his agreement as affecting the amount of damages, some holding that where he is guilty of fraud, or has acted dishonestly, substantial damages may be awarded to the purchaser, whilst others take the opposite view, and declare that the motives which actuated the seller can have no influence on the principle involved, and that the damages in either event will be the same. In Flurean v. Thornhill (2 W. Bl. 1,078) it was held that the contracts for the sale of real estate are on the condition, always implied if not expressed, that the seller has a good title, and if without fraud he fails to convey by such title, the vendee is not entitled to damages for the loss of his bargain. But in the still later and very recent case of Engel v. Fitch (L. R. 3 Q. B. 314), this question was subjected to a very full and elaborate discussion in the Queen's Bench. It appeared in this case that the defendants, mortgagees of the lease of a house, sold it by auction to the plaintiff, the particulars of the sale stating that the possession would be given on completion of the purchase. The plaintiff resold it at an advance to a person who wanted the house for occupation. Upon an investigation of the title it was found satisfactory, but on the plaintiff requiring possession, before completing the purchase, the mortgagor was found to be in possession, and refused to give it up. The defendants could have ousted him by ejectment, but they refused to complete the sale on the ground of expense. On this the plaintiff brought an action for breach of the contract of sale, and it was held that, as the breach of contract arose, not from inability of the defendants to make a good title, but from their refusal to take the necessary steps to give the plaintiff possession pursuant to their contract, the plaintiff could recover, not only the deposit and the expenses of investigating the title, but also damages for the loss of his bargain, and that the measure of damages was the profit which it was shown he could have made on a sale. The cases bearing on the subject were all thoroughly reviewed, and the above results arrived at.

The case of Engel v. Fitch was affirmed in Exchequer Chamber (L. R. 4 Q. B. 659), with a slight difference in the mode of stating the measure of damages which was held to be the difference between the contract price and the value at the time of the breach of the contract, the profit which it was shown the plaintiff could have made, on a resale, being the evidence of this enhanced value and its amount. In delivering the judgment, Kelly, Ch. B., said: "No case has been cited in which the purchaser of real property has been held disentitled to recover damages like the present, except in the case of Fleurean v. Thornhill and the cases which followed it, and upon the one ground of the vendor's inability to make out a title; and there is no authority to show that when the breach of contract has been on any other ground, any other rule, as to damages, applies in contracts as to the sale of real property than that which prevails in the ordinary case of a breach of contract." This decision is highly approved by Mr. Dart, and in commenting upon it (2 Dart Vend. and P. 4th Eng. Ed., 873-4) he says: "This decision, though scarcely reconcilable with some of the earlier authorities, has placed the rule on a clear and intelligent footing, and has excluded from its operation the case of a vendor selling mala fide, or entering into a merely speculative contract for sale." This rule, then, is clearly deducible from the English authorities: If the vendor knew, at the time the contract was entered into, that he had no title; or if the sale goes off because he changes his mind; or because he neglects to take the necessary steps for putting the purchasers into possession; the purchaser may, in an action for breach of such contract, recover, beyond his expenses, damages for the loss of his bargain. 1 Chit. Contracts, 11th Am. Ed. 437. Mr. Perkins, in his last edition of Sugden on Vendors and Pur., in an elaborate note, says that the current of American authorities now runs in the same direction. He says that it has been held, that where the vendor has, in bad faith, agreed to sell land to which he knew he had no title (McDonnell v. Dunlap, Hardin, 41; Davis v. Lewis, 4 Bibb, 456; Baldwin v. Munn, 2 Wend. 399; McNair v. Compton, 35 Penn. St. 23; Brinckerhoff v. Phelps, 24 Barb. 100; S. C., 43 Barb. 469; Drake v. Baker, 34 N. J. 358; Peters v. McKeon, 4 Denio, 456; Bush v. Cole, 28 N. Y. 261); where, having the title at the time of the agreement to convey, he has afterwards disabled himself from conveying by a transfer to a third person (Wilson v. Spencer, 11 Leigh, 261; Dustin v. Newcomer, 8 Ohio, 49); where he refuses to convey because the land is greatly enhanced in value (Brinckerhoff v. Phelps, 24 Barb. 100; S. C., 43 Barb. 469), and also where, having the title at the time, he ought to convey according to his agreement, he still refuses to convey; in all these cases, in a suit at law for a breach of the agreement to convey, the vendee is entitled to recover such sum as will indemnify him for the actual and direct loss sustained by the non-performance of the agreement, which would generally be the difference between the contract price and the enhanced value of the land, when the conveyance should have been made." Western Railway v. Babcock, 6 Met. 358; Pringle v. Spaulding, 53 Barb. 17. So in Michigan, the measure of damages for a willful breach of a contract to sell and convey a lot of land, was held to be the difference between the actual value of the land at the time of the breach and the sum agreed to be paid. Allen v. Atkinson, 21 Mich. 353. And again, in the case of Hammond v. Hannin (Id. 374), the court regards it as settled, that, while the ordinary measure of damages for breaking a covenant to sell real estate continues, the consideration, money and interest, with, perhaps, also the cost of investigating the title; yet, that where a party contracts to sell, knowing he cannot make a title, or having a title, refuses to convey, or disables himself from conveying, or otherwise acts in bad faith, the vendor is remitted to his general liability. The rule is, then, the same in relation to real as to personal property, and the measure of damage is the value of the land at the time of the breach. The same rule prevails in the Supreme Court of the United States. In Hopkins v. Lee (6 Wheat. 109), the court said "the rule is settled in this court, that in an action by the vendee for a breach of contract on the part of the vendor, for not delivering the article, the measure of damages is its price at the time of its breach. The price being settled by the contract, which is generally the case, makes no difference, nor ought it to make any; otherwise the vendor, if the article has risen in value, would always have it in his power to discharge himself from his contract and put the enhanced value in his own pocket; nor can it make any difference in principle whether the contract be for real or personal property, if the lands, as is the case here, have not been improved or built on. In both cases the vendor is entitled to have the thing agreed for at the contract price, and to sell it himself at its increased value. If it be withheld, the owner ought to make good to him the difference."

So in Maine, Hill v. Hobart (16 Maine, 164), it was decided, that in debt for breach of a bond conditioned for the conveyance of land, the measure of damages was the value of the land at the time the conveyance should have been made. The court says, when the vendee proceeds at law, he is entitled to a complete indemnity and no more. By a performance he would have received the land, and not receiving that, if he obtains the value at the time, that is the exact measure of his loss. And the same doctrine is announced in many other cases. Warren v. Wheeler, 21 Me. 484; Lawrence v. Chase, 54 Id. 196; King v. Brown, 2 Hill, 485; Boardman v. Keeler, 21 Vt. 84; Bryant v. Hambrick, 9 Georgia, 133; Barnham v. Nichols, 3 R. I. 187; Burr v. Todd, 41 Pa. St. 206; Shaw v. Wilkins, 8 Humph. 647; McKee v. Brandon, 2 Scammon, 399; Hopkins v. Yowell, 5 Yerger, 305; Cannell v. McLean, 6 Har. and J. 297; Marshall v. Haney, 9 Gill, 251; Whiteside v. Jennings, 19 Ala. 784. The same principle is applied where the vendor has not actually tendered performance, or has not made an available tender, but, in consequence of the acts of the vendor, or otherwise, is still entitled to maintain a suit for breach of contract on the part of the vendor in not conveying. In such a case the measure of damages would be the same, namely: the difference between the contract price and the value of the land at the time of the breach. Lee v. Russell, 8 Ired. 526; Nichols v. Freeman, 11 Ired. 99; Goodwin v. Francis, L. R. 5 C. P. 295. The rule must be reciprocal; where the property has enhanced in value, the purchaser gets the benefit of the enhancement, so where a depreciation has taken place he must submit to a corresponding loss. In both cases he obtains the true measure of damages, full compensation for the loss sustained. Thus, in Nichols v. Freeman, the plaintiff purchased a lot of land for $8,000, and paid the greater part of the purchase-money. The plaintiff was let into possession, and the defendant executed a bond in the penalty of $10,000, conditioned to convey upon the payment of the balance of the purchase money. The plaintiff was evicted by the judgment-creditors of the defendant, and the property sold by the plaintiff for $2,500, which was admitted to be the real value of the property at the time. The court refused to allow the plaintiff to recover the amount of purchase-money, as if he had repudiated the contract and sued for money had and received. It was said: "Here the plaintiff seeks to recover compensation; what sum will put him in as good a condition as if the contract had been performed? In this case he would have got property which is worth $2,500, but he would have been forced to pay the balance of the purchase-money and interest. He has not paid this latter amount, and his damage is the difference between that sum and the value of the property, which, by the case, is agreed to be $207.80;" and to that sum the redress was limited. So, in Goodwin v. Francis, where the purchase-money had not been paid, Boville, Ch. J., in delivering his opinion, said: "I am not aware of any decision in which it has been held that, where a man having a good title refuses to convey, according to contract, he is not liable to compensate the other party for the loss of his bargain, as well as for any expenses he may have actually incurred; the contrary is laid down in Engel v. Fitch, and I do not see that Sikes v. Wild is inconsistent with it, for in that case there was a failure of the title. I think, therefore, that the defendant is liable for the difference between the contract price and the market value of the estate, and that the price at which it was resold is prima facie evidence of its market value." Where there is no evidence given showing any change in the situation, the consideration paid and interest will be taken as the correct value of the land.

But where there is evidence given showing a change in the value of the land, the value at the time the breach occurred, and when the conveyance ought to be made, will furnish the standard of damages. This is fair and just for both parties, as they obtain precisely what they are entitled to, and the basis is predicated on actual loss, the full and adequate compensation. The rule commends itself for its intrinsic justice. It conforms to the varying circumstances of each case, and is equitable and just. The arbitrary and unbending rule that the purchase-money and interest shall in all cases be taken as the criterion of damages, will, in the majority of instances, do injustice either to the seller or purchaser. No reason is perceived why it should be adhered to and enforced, when one more consistent with equity is found, and which is easily administered. The rule for which we contend is just to both parties. It gives to the purchaser precisely what he has lost in consequence of the breach of contract committed by his vendor, and it makes the latter responsible for the violation of his agreement in the full amount in which he has occasioned injury. Now in the present case, the plaintiff still owed a part of the purchase-money for the land, but he cannot obtain a conveyance of the land upon the balance due, because the defendant has disabled himself from conveying by selling the land to another person.

What, then, is the extent of his loss, and what constitutes the measure of his damages? Plainly, the difference between what he owes on the land and what the land is worth. Wherefore it follows that the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded.

The other judges concur.

Constitutional Law—Release of State's Lien upon Railroads.

SILAS WOODSON AND H. CLAY EWING v. URIEL A. MURDOCK AND LUTHER C. CLARK.

Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1874.

1. Constitutional Law—Power of Legislature to Release State's Lien upon Railroad.—The constitution of Missouri provides that "the general assembly shall have no power, for any purpose, to release the lien held by the state upon any railroad." Held, that this did not prohibit the legislature from compounding a debt due and to become due by a railroad company to the state, and thereby discharging the state's lien. (Miller and Davis, JJ., dissenting.)

2. ——. ——. Case in Judgment.—The Missouri Pacific Railroad Company had become liable to the state of Missouri for the payment of $7,000,000 of state bonds which had been issued in aid of this road, which bonds had not yet matured, and also for $4,000,000 interest on said bonds, which the company had failed to pay when due. An act of the legislature directed a sale of the road under the state's lien thereon, but contained also a provision that if the railroad company should, at any time within ninety days of the first day of April, 1868, pay into the treasury of the state the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in the bonds of the state or in money, then, and in that event, the governor should not advertise the road for sale; and if the company should, within ninety days thereafter, pay into the state treasury an additional sum equal to five millions of dollars in all (either in cash or Missouri state bonds), the governor should, upon the production of the receipts of the state treasurer for the said amounts, execute and deliver to the said Pacific Railroad Company a deed of release for all claims, title and interest which the state of Missouri had in and to the railroad, its property and appurtenances; and that the Pacific Railroad Company should, from and after the delivery of the deed, be fully discharged from all claims or debts due the state, and all liability growing out of the issue of the bonds of the state to aid in the construction of their railroad. Held:

(2.) That it did not contravene the fourth section of that part of the constitution of Missouri known as the railroad ordinance, which provides that in case the railroad companies which had recived state aid should refuse or neglect to pay a tax on their gross receipts levied by such ordinance, and the interest or principal of any of said bonds, or any part thereof should remain due and unpaid, the general assembly should provide by law for the sale of the railroad and other property, and the franchise of the company that should be thus in default, under the lien reserved to the state, and should appropriate the proceeds of such sale to the payment of the amount remaining due and unpaid from said company. This ordinance did not forbid the sale of a defaulting railroad, except at public auction, for a price equal to the full amount of the debt of the defaulting company, and without a reservation of a lien upon the property sold, not merely for the unpaid part of the purchase-money, but for all that remains unpaid of the debt for which the property is sold, but it left the legislature free to provide other means of collecting the debt and enforcing the lien.

3. ——. ——. Acts of Legislature—Subject-Matter not Expressed in Title.—The act in question was entitled, 'an act for the sale of the Pacific Railroad and to foreclose the state's lien thereon, and to amend the charter thereof." Held, that it was not obnoxious to a constitutional inhibition against the passage of acts which relate to more than one subject, and that not expressed in the title.

The facts of this case will be found fully stated in the report of the case in the court below, 2 Dillon, C. C. ——. The opinion of the court also states them with adequate fullness to an understanding of the question involved.

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

It has not been contended here that the complainants are not entitled to the injunction decreed by the circuit court, if the act of the Missouri legislature approved March 31st, 1868, was a legitimate exercise of the legislative power.' But it is insisted that the 5th section of that act is in conflict with the constitution of the state, and, therefore, that the arrangement made under it with the Pacific Railroad Company cannot be held to operate as a discharge of the company from the debt due by it to the state, or as a release of the railroad from the lien of the state's mortgage. The question presented, then, is this: Was the fifth section of the act mentioned prohibited by the constitution of the state? By the first section the governor was directed to sell the Pacific railroad and its appurtenances in accordance with the provisions of section five of the act, and of an act approved February 22d, 1851, entitled "An act to expedite the construction of the Pacific Railroad and the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad." By the second section the price for which the railroad was directed to be sold was required to be not less than eight millions and three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, payable to the state treasurer, in bonds of the state or in money, within ninety days from the day of sale. If that sum was not obtained the governor was required to buy in the railroad for the state. By the third section it was made a condition of the sale that the purchaser or purchasers should bind himself or themselves to change the gauge of the road within ten years from the date of sale, so as to conform to the gauge of the Union Pacific railroad. The fourth section enacted that upon the payment of all the purchase money, and upon the delivery of an obligation, in conformity to the requirement of the third section, the governor should execute a deed to the purchaser or purchasers conveying all such right, title, and interest in and to the said Pacific railroad, its franchises, appurtenances, and the property belonging thereto, as were subject to the lien of the state. Then followed the fifth section, which is the one mainly in contest. It enacted that if the Pacific Railroad Company should, at any time within ninety days after the first day of April, 1868, pay into the treasury of the state the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in the bonds of the state or in money, then, and in that event, the governor should not advertise the road for sale; and if the company should, within ninety days thereafter, pay into the state treasury an additional sum, equal to five millions of dollars in all, (either in cash or in Missouri state bonds), the governor should, upon the production of the receipts of the state treasurer for the said amounts, execute and deliver to the said Pacific Railroad Company a deed of release for all claims, title, and interest which the state of Missouri had in and to the railroad, its property and appurtenances, and that the Pacific Railroad Company should, from and after the delivery of the deed, be fully discharged form all claims or debts due the state, and all liability growing out of the issue of the bonds of the state to aid in the construction of their railroad.

Within ninety days after the passage of this act, the company paid into the state treasury $350,000, and within ninety days after such payment $4,650,000 more, in all $5,000,000, the sum specified in the 5th section, and received from the governor a deed conveying all the right, title, and interest of the state, and discharging it from all liens and claims of the state, and from all liability growing out of the issue of state bonds, to aid in the construction of its road.

That this was a compromise of the claims of the state against the company—practically, a sale to the company of the state's interest growing out of its advance of state bonds under the statutes of 1851, and the following years, is very plain, and such was its obvious intention. The principal of the debt was not then payable. The bonds issued by the state had not then fallen due. All of them were either twenty or thirty-year bonds, and the company was under no obligation to pay the principal until the bonds became payable. The extent of her obligation was measured by the provision of the act of 1851. That act required the company to make provision for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds in such manner as to exonerate the state from any advances of money for that purpose, and, had the interest been paid up to 1868, the state could then have exacted no more. The interest, it is true, was in arrears from July 1st, 1859, To that extent the state had an immediate claim upon the company, but as the whole debt, according to the agreed statement of facts, was $7,000,000, the aggregate of unpaid interest in 1868 was less than $4,000,000. The arrangement then made, by which five millions was received in full satisfaction, and the deed given, included, therefore, not only interest due, but principal which had not fallen due, and, hence, it may properly be regarded as a commutation or a sale of the rights of the state to the company.

We come, then, to the question whether anything in the constitution of the state prohibits such a transaction. A new constitution was adopted in 1865, the fifteenth section of the fourth article of which is as follows: "The general assembly shall have no power, for any purpose, to release the lien held by the state upon any railroad." This ordinance, it is insisted by the appellants, denied to the legislature the power the make such a disposition of the interests of the state as was made in 1868 in virtue of the 5th section of the act of March 31st of that year.

The language of the prohibition is remarkable. It is not that the general assembly shall not release the debt, due to the state by any railroad company. Legislative control over the debt is left untouched. The provision has reference only to a security for the debt. Had it been intended to put the debt beyond the disposition of the legislature, it would be difficult to find a reason for confining the prohibition to a release merely of the lien. But it is easy to see why it should be ordained that while the debt remained the security for it should not be given up. And that such was the intention appears quite plainly in view of the state of things which existed when the constitution was framed and adopted. Prior to its adoption it may be said to have become almost a legislative habit to release the liens held by the state upon railroads without discharging the debts. In numerous cases statutes had been enacted by which railroad companies were authorized to borrow money and to mortgage their roads as security for the loans, the state releasing its lien to give the mortgagees a priority. The purposes for which these releases were made were various, and they were generally avowed in the statutes. Thus in 1864 the legislature released the state's lien upon a part of the Pacific road, avowedly for the purpose of enabling the company to complete its main road to Kansas City. At the same time the lien of the state on the North Missouri Railroad was released for several avowed purposes—to enable the company to complete their main road to the Iowa state line; enable the company to construct its west branch; and to enable it to build a bridge across the Missouri river. And again, in 1865, February 16, the legislature released the first lien of the state upon the road of the same company for the same purposes, retaining, however, a second lien. All this took place very shortly before the constitution was adopted. That such releases were contemplated when the convention framed the constitutional inhibition, and when the people ratified it, can hardly be doubted. The constitution was plainly intended to prohibit them, and, therefore, language was employed denying the power to release the lien, and saying nothing of the debt. Certainly there is no expressed restriction of legislative power over the debt itself. If any exists it must be supplied by implication. Keeping in mind, then, that the constitutional prohibition is directed only against a release of liens, what should be regarded as it meaning? We agree it is not to be frittered away by doubtful construction, but like every clause in every constitution, it must have a reasonable interpretation, and be held to express the intention of its framers. It must be held to have been intended for the public protection, for the preservation of the public property, and to make available claims the state held against railroads. But if it is to be construed reasonably, and in accordance with what must have been the intentions of those who adopted it, it cannot be construed literally. It cannot mean that the lien of the state upon a railroad shall not be released upon full payment of the debt, to secure which the lien was created. If it does, it is equivalent to a prohibition against the state's receiving payment. Surely it will not be contended to deprive the legislature of power to make use of the lien to enforce satisfaction of the debt, though thereby the lien be discharged. That would be to destroy the value of the lien. Nor can it mean that the lien may not be employed to obtain from the property bound by it all that the property is worth, and all that the indebted company can pay, though that be less than the entire amount of the debt. It is not a restriction upon the power of the legislature to make the most, which in its judgment is possible, from the security. In terms, the legislature is left unrestricted as to the mode of receiving payment, or settling with its debtors. Composition, accord, and satisfaction, and full payment in cash are left within the legislative discretion, at least so far as the liquidation of the debt is concerned. So there is nothing in the clause of the constitution quoted which can be regarded as a restriction upon the power of the legislature to sell any claims held by the state against a railroad company. It is not an ordinance that the legislature shall not deal with debts due to the state from railroad companies as it may deal with debts due from other debtors. It is that the lien shall not be released for any purpose whatever, that is, for the accomplishment of any object the legislature might have in view, and unless we can hold this means it shall not be released even by full payment of the debt, it can mean no more than this, that, while the debt remains, the legislature may not let go the security for it. Such a construction accounts for the peculiarity of the language employed. There is a very palpable distinction between the lien which the state holds upon a railroad, and the debt, obligation, or duty which the lien was created to secure. The two could not have been confounded by the framers of the constitution. If it was intended that, under all circumstances, every dollar due from a a railroad company should be exacted, and that no settlement should be made, or sale authorized, without payment of the utmost farthing, it is incredible that the constitution would not have so declared. That such was not the intention is plainly shown by the railroad ordinance adopted with the constitution, and a part of the organic law of the state. By that ordinance the legislature was authorized and directed to sell the railroads on their failure to pay a tax levied, and when the sale should be made to others than the indebted companies, no limitation was directed to be affixed to the price, and such a sale, we have no doubt, would have discharged the road from the state's lien. The state itself was empowered to become a purchaser at the sale at any price at which it could buy, and whenever it purchased, the lien, of course, was merged in the title, and the general assembly was required to provide by law in what manner the railroad, or franchises, or other property, should be sold for the payment of the indebtedness of the company in default. But the ordinance does not require that at such sale the purchaser from the state shall pay the full amount of that indebtedness. A lien is required to be reserved for all sums remaining unpaid; that is, very clearly, for all that part of the purchase-money from the state, at her sale, which remains unpaid. If this is not the meaning, the state may never be able to sell at all, and the plain purpose of the ordinance may be entirely frustrated. And that such is its meaning has been determined by the Supreme Court of Missouri. See 37 Missouri, 129. The fifth section of the ordinance does, indeed, require that no railroad or other property, or franchise purchased by the state, shall be restored to the company in default, until it shall have first paid in money, or in Missouri state bonds, or in bonds guaranteed by the state, all interest due from said company, and requires that all interest coming due thereafter shall be paid semi-annually in advance, but even this is no assertion that such a restoration shall not be made for a sum less than the original indebtedness. Whether it may or not it is unnecessary to decide, for the provision applies only to a case where the road has been sold, and where the state has become the purchaser, which is not this case.

Neither the clause in the body of the constitution, therefore, nor any provisions of the railroad ordinance, forbid the legislature to sell the railroad, or compromise the debt claimed by the state, for less than the entire indebtedness. It follows, then, that though the legislature had no power to release the lien while the debt remained, it was not prohibited from selling the claim or commuting the debt. And there is no inconsistency in this. The legislature may well have been trusted with the management of the obligation, responsible only to its constituents, while the security for the fulfillment of the obligation may have been withdrawn from its control. A trustee may have no right to give up a security for a claim, and yet be at full liberty to settle and adjust the claim itself or to sell it. It need hardly be added that if the legislature had power to accept a commutation of the claim of the state, or to sell the debt for what in its judgment it deemed best for the public interests, it had also power to make a formal relinquishment of the lien after the debt had been liquidated. The constitutional provision was not designed to continue in existence liens that the law had extinguished.

For these reasons we hold that the fifth section of the act of the legislature of March 31, 1868, was not in conflict with that provision of the constitution which forbids, for any purpose whatever, a release of the lien held by the state upon any railroad.

Nor do we perceive that there is any conflict between it and the railroad ordinance. The appellants insist that the ordinance forbids any sale of a defaulting railroad, except at public auction, for a price equal to the full amount of the debt of the defaulting company, and without a reservation of a lien upon the property sold, not merely for the unpaid part of the purchase-money, but for all that remains unpaid of the debt for which the property is sold. Such is not our reading of the ordinance, nor is it that of the supreme court of the state. We have already said that the lien required to to be reserved is only to secure the unpaid balance of the purchase-money. This is too clear for argument. It is equally clear to us the ordinance does not require that the sale shall be for a price equal to the whole debt, or that it shall be at public auction. The first, second, and thirdsections impose upon each of the three railroad companies, of which the Pacific Railroad Company is one, an annual tax of ten per centum of the gross receipts, for two years, and fifteen per centum thereafter, until the principal and interest of the bonds for which the companies were liable should be fully paid. Then followed the fourth section, as follows: "Should either of the said companies refuse or neglect to pay said tax herein required, and the interest or principal of any said bonds, or any part thereof remain due and unpaid, the general assembly shall provide by law for the sale of the railroad and other property, and the franchise of the company that shall be thus in default, under the lien reserved to the state, and shall appropriate the proceeds of such sale to the payment of the amount remaining due and unpaid from said company." There is nothing in this which takes away from the legislature the power to determine the time, the manner, or the price of the sale which it was directed to cause to be made. It is true the sale is ordered to be made under the lien reserved to the state, referring, doubtless, to the mortgage taken under the act of 1851, and it is also true that by that act it was enacted that if either of the companies. to which bonds might be issued should make default in the payment of either principal or interest of the said bonds, the governor might sell their road by auction, giving six months' notice, or buy it in for the use of the state, but these provisions were no part of the lien. They were means specified for enforcing it. The legislature was at liberty to provide other means of collecting the debt and enforcing the lien. The sale directed by the ordinance was for non-payment of the tax imposed, and the direction to sell under the lien reserved, was simply an order to proceed to collect the mortgage. The lien is not to be confounded with proceedings for its foreclosure.

Finally, it is insisted by the appellants that the 5th section of the act of 1868 is unconstitutional because its subject is not embraced in the title of the act, and because the constitution ordains that "no law enacted by the general assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title; but if any subject be not embraced in the title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as is not so expressed." The title of the act of 1868 is "An act for the sale of the Pacific railroad, and to foreclose the state's lien thereon, and to amend the charter thereof." That the subject of the 5th section is embraced in this title, is very apparent. If the subject is not the foreclosure of the state's lien, it is impossible to say what it is. And we think it cannot be justly said the act embraces more than one subject. It has many details, but they all relate to one general subject, which is the sale of the railroad and the foreclosure of the state's lien thereon. Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 141, et seq.

We cannot sustain this objection.

Nothing, then, in our judgment, warrants the conclusion that the 5th section of the act of March 31st, 1868, was not a legitimate exercise of the legislative power of the general assembly of the state. It follows that the arrangement made in pursuance of it with the Pacific Railroad Company, and the deed of the governor to the company, extinguished the debt due to the state, and, consequently, put an end to the lien.

The five millions of dollars paid to the state were raised upon bonds of the company and a mortgage, of which the complainants in the court below are the trustees. The money was advanced on the faith of the legislation of 1868, and so were $3,000,000 more, for which a subsequent mortgage was given. If that legislation was not unconstitutional, as we have endeavored to show it was not, it would be a gross wrong to the bondholders who thus advanced their money, were the defendants permitted to sell the railroad, its property and franchises, for the satisfaction of a claim or lien which has no longer any existence.

The decree of the circuit court awarding an injunction is, therefore, affirmed.

Action for the Death of a Human Being—The Case of Sullivan v. Union Pacific Railroad Company.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—This decision, published in your paper of Nov. 27th, seems to me to deserve, not merely as you yourselves say of it, "a passing notice," but very careful study. As Judge Dillon's connection with the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, may be in the way of its receiving from the editors all the attention it deserves, permit a volunteer to offer a few words upon the principle involved.

At common law there are two (and I think only two) distinct rules by which an action for civil damages, based upon the death of a human being, might be defeated, provided it came within the terms of either one. In the first place, if the death was caused by a felony, any action for a civil remedy for it would be merged in the criminal prosecution, according to the doctrine of Higgins v. Butcher, cited by Judge Dillon. Strictly speaking, the civil remedy would not be merged, but only suspended till the conclusion of the criminal action: Marsh v. Stone, 6 B. and C. 551, 557, 564; but as the punishment for a felony causing death was not only the death of the offender, but the forfeiture of his property, this distinction was of little practical importance. The rule applied only to cases of felony, but in such cases would cut off an action brought either by the representatives of the deceased, or by any person damaged by his death.

In the second place, the principle that a personal action dies with the person, which was always regarded as peculiarly applicable to personal torts, operated to abate any cause of action that might otherwise have belonged to the injured party. This was not limited to cases of felony, but applied equally to deaths by negligence or misadventure. On the other hand, it had no application to actions brought by a husband, parent, master, etc., of the deceased, for the damages sustained by him through the death. Thus it is evident that the two rules are not co-terminous. The latter applies to all cases where the party dying would have been the plaintiff, whether the death were felonious or not; the former, to all cases of tort amounting to felony, whether brought by the injured party himself, (i. e. in cases of death by his representatives), or by some other party interested in his life.

The two rules together embraced so large a proportion of all actionable deaths (particularly before the great increase of travel and deaths in travel due to modern improvements), that it is hardly to be wondered at if the few cases that came under neither rule were lost sight of, and the death alone came to be regarded as sufficient to take the case out of the class of actionable torts. Such examples of the extension of a rule beyond the limits of the principle on which it was founded, are by no means rare in our law; and when we consider that in this instance there were two rules, precisely similar in their practical effects, often coinciding in their application to a single case, and one or the other of them cutting off the vast majority of all cases of action for death, we can hardly wonder that after a time, it came to be assumed by hasty thinkers that "the death of a human being, though clearly involving pecuniary loss, was not the ground of an action for damages." 1 Hill. on Torts, 83, and cases cited.

Just when this insensible extension of the true rule was first made, is now, perhaps, impossible to state. With great respect for Judge Dillon's extraordinary erudition and accuracy, I cannot help thinking it dates far back of the origin he assigns it in Baker v. Bolton. Although Blackstone does not lay down the rule in express terms, I think no one can read the brief sentence in which he passes over the subject in the course of a careful enumeration of all actions for private wrongs, without feeling convinced that he was unware of any action for damages for the death of a human being, under any circumstances. 3 Comm. 119. And Judge Wilson, in one of those lectures on law that deserves far more attention than they have received from the present generation (if only as the first attempt ever made to teach a distinctively American system of law), after supposing the murder of a father in the presence of his family, informs us that there was no civil remedy. "The widow and the orphans, who were the witnesses of the crime, and the sufferers by the loss, are recognized in the former, but not in the latter character" (works of James Wilson, Vol. III, p. 30, Ed. 1804). This, of itself, might only refer to the amitted doctrine in a case of felony; especially as he goes on to suppose them applying for the recompense, and the law answering: "His property is forfeited by the crime; no funds remain to make you reparation for your loss." But in the next page he informs us that "in one of the very early laws of Pennsylvania (i. e. early in the eighteenth century) it is directed that those next of kin shall be considered in the loss occasioned by the death of the party killed" (ib. p. 31, citing R. O. Book A. p. 49) such a statute of course implies that no remedy was then understood to exist at the common law.

On the other hand, it is certain that the true doctrine, though generally overlooked, was not altogether forgotten. Beside the case of Ford v. Monroe, mentioned by Judge Dillon, and which has by others been erroneously called the only one of its kind in the books, there is Jones v. Perry, 2 Espenasse, 482, where the father of a child that died of hydrophobia, was allowed to recover from the owner of the dog the expenses of his illness, and perhaps others. But the one best worth notice, is Cross v. Guthrey, 2 Root, 90, decided in Connecticut as early as 1794. It was an action of the case against a physician who had so unskillfully amputated the breast of plaintiff's wife that she died in about three hours, whereby the plaintiff was put to cost and expense, and deprived of the society of his said wife, etc. After a verdict of £40 for plaintiff, the defendant moved in arrest of judgment, because the private injury was merged in the public offence. But the court say: "The declaration is sufficient; the rule urged by the defendant is applicable only to capital crimes, where from necessity the offender must go unpunished, or the injured individual go unredressed."

It is remarkable that this case, the very first American decision on the subject, and fourteen years before Baker v. Bolton, has been so completely overlooked in all the subsequent discussions of the rule. It will of course be seen that it furnishes an authority, directly in point, for Judge Dillon's recent decision; and that the latter is not only correct in principle, but brings back the American law, at least, to the exact position with which it started.

But I have already trespassed too long on your space, and can only express, in conclusion, my earnest wish that our judges would follow Judge Dillon's example more frequently, in boldly testing cases by the light of principle, rather than contenting themselves with heaping up great masses of unexamined tested citations

Yours respectfully, W. G. H.

Notes and Queries.

I. FALSUS IN UNO, FALSUS IN OMNIBUS—ANSWER TO "SCIENCE OF THE LAW."

LEAVENWORTH, KAS, Dec. 2d, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In No. 48 of your journal (ante, p. 599) we notice a communication from some person signing himself "Science of the Law," embracing a criticism of a late decision of the Supreme Court of Kansas in the case of Gannon v. Stevens. We have examined the official syllabus of the case, and found therein no allusion to, or mention of, any principle of law pertaining to the credibility of witnesses, as claimed by "Science of the Law." This fact, we think, conclusively shows, that if the question was made in the briefs or arguments of counsel in the case, the same was not passed upon by the court, or only incidentally noticed. The statutes of Kansas require the court to prepare a syllabus in each case, embracing all the principles of law decided therein. Perhaps the instruction complained of by "Science of the Law," was not properly before the court. Be this as it may, we deem it but just to the supreme court brefly to state its decisions on the principle of law in question, in former cases.

The first case in which this question was decided (Campbell v. The State, 3 Kas. 488), as reported, states the rule to be as follows: "If the jury believe, from all the evidence, that the witness, M. B., has testified falsely in respect to any material fact, it is their duty to disregard the whole of her testimony." This decision, if it ever was decided as reported (see reporter's note in 8 Kas. 142), was materially qualified in the case of Hale v. Rawallie, 8 Kas. 142, in which case Brewer, J., in speakiug of the rule in such cases, says: "The testimony of a witness who, in some point has ignorantly testified falsely, is not wholly to be rejected. Only that witness is wholly to be disbelieved who has knowingly and willfully testified to a falsehood." In the case of The State v. Horne, 9 Kas. 131, the rule in principle, as last stated, was acquiesced in by the court. A still later case, Wood v. M., K. & T. Railway Co., 11 Kas. 322, speaking of the principle involved in the questio under consideration, says: "But where the recording officers are proved to have knowingly made a largely false and fraudulent record, how can we place reliance on any of the record? Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus. Does the written testimony of a witness stand higher than the oral? If these five election officers were on the witness stand and testified that 546 legal voters cast their votes on that day for Fredonia, and it should afterward appear that they knowingly and willfully testified falsely in reference to 127 of these votes, and the number of votes was material, would not the district court have been compelled to reject their entire testimony?"—citing 3 Kas. 488. Taking the explanation of the reporter (Note, 8 Kas. 142), in conjunction with the report of the case of Campbell v. The State, 3 Kas. 488, and the subsequent decisions, the rule in Kansas (unless changed by the case of Gannon v. Stevens), would seem to be this: That if the jury believe that a witness knowingly and willfully has testified falsely in respect to a material fact in the case, then the jury must disregard the whole of his (or her) testimony. This proposition, we think, "Science of the Law" will find in harmony with the majority of decided cases, and with the fundamental principles of the law of evidence. In fact, the cases cited by him support the above rule in toto, and do not conflict with the decisions of the Supreme Court of Kansas, so far as reported. The court, having decided the question in concord with both principle and authority, and reaffirmed the same in several instances, would, in our opinion, at this late day, not change the rule, unless upon a thorough examination, which in all probability would be noted in the syllabus of the case. We think, that, until the case of Gannon v. Stevens is reported, there will necessarily arise a very strong presumption of fact that the case does not decide or apply the rule as squarely as stated by "Science of the Law." A. B.

II. FALSUS IN UNO, FALSUS IN OMNIBUS.

DOVER, DEL., Dec. 3, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In the case put by your correspondent, "Science of the Law," the evidence was wholly for the jury. They were the judges of its weight and effect; and, in coming to a just conclusion, would properly and necessarily have regard to the character and standing of the witness, as well as the consistency of his narative or statement. The part of the charge of the learned judge in italics, and commented upon by your correspondent, could not properly be binding, and probably was not intended to be so.

The maxim itself, falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, like most maxims, is founded in wisdom and experience, and is the only safe rule. It is always predicated of a wilfully false witness, one who, for gain, malice, or other corrupt cause, on oath, affirms what is not so, or denies what is so. The reason of the rule will be more apparent, and our respect for it be strengthened, if we consider for a moment the nature of an oath. It is a direct and solemn appeal to God that we speak the truth. It is a public pledge of our conscience in the most solemn manner, that we speak the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Society has prescribed this form, and we assent to it. So we call both God and man to be witnesses and judges. If we speak falsely, we say, God will judge us at the last day. If we speak falsely, we say, man will judge and punish us by the law of the land. In view of all this, one who testifies corruptly in one thing, should not be believed in any; for the pledge he has given of his truth has been broken, and we have no other. Falsus iu uno, falsus in omnibus. J. ALEXANDER FULTON.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Monthly Western Jurist (Bloomington, Ill.), has an article entitled Larceny in Foreign Countries not Punishable in the United States.

It publishes a decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois (Stowe v. Flagg) with the following syllabus:

1. A corporation cannot be created by agreement of parties, and can only be created by legislative enactment.

2. The act relating to the formation of manufacturing companies, etc., corporation laws of 1857, Laws of 1857, page 161, examined and construed, an held, that in order to the creation of such corporation, that when the certificate described in the first section of the act shall have been filed in the office of the clerk of the court, and a duplicate thereof filed in the office of the secretary of state, and he shall issue his license, the parties, etc., and their successors, shall constitute a body corporate, etc.

3. Stock is essential to the existence of a manufacturing company under the statute, and there must be at least three stockholders.

4. That until such proceedings are had the proposed corporate property is not changed to corporate property.

Another by the same court (Merritt v. Gates) stating when the acknowledgement of a deed by a married woman, is sufficient to convey land of which she owns the fee; 2, that where a certificate of acknowledgment is signed, and the deed delivered to the grantee, the officer cannot amend the same, nor execute a new certificate for the purpose of giving validity to the deed. At the end of this case the editor of the Jurist says:

"But it must be observed that the deed in question was executed and delivered prior to the act of 1869, and is applicable only to conveyances executed prior to that time. For a full discussion of the act of 1869 and 1872, see the case of Simmons v. Hervey, ante page 20," and note. See also, Trustees of School v. Davidson et al., ante, page 164. If the rule declared in the case has been changed by statute, why publish it?

Another, by the same court, Thomas v. Board of Trustees, holds that a mechanic's lien cannot be created against the Industrial University at Champaign, for the reason that that institution is a state institution, "distinguishing," says the editor, "the case from the case of The Board of Education v. Greenbaum & Son, 39 Ill. 609, which was a petition against the Board of Education of the state of Illinois for a mechanic's lien, when it was held that the property of the Normal University is not the property of the state, but is the property of 'The Board of Education of the State of Illinois,' a corporation whose charter cannot be repealed by the legislature. The corporation may sue and be sued, and unlike a municipal corporation, the only remedy a creditor has against it is by judgment and execution, as in a case against an individual or other corporation not of a municipal character. And that the building is subject to the claims of a creditor under the law for the enforcement of mechanic's lien. In the principal case the court say: 'Plaintiff in error, so far as we can see, has a complete remedy by suit under the statute, against the board of trustees and contractor, by recovering judgment and execution thereon.' "We doubt," continues the editor, "whether the court intended to hold that the building and grounds of the University were liable to levy and forced sale. We are of opinion that the court did not intend to hold that a creditor of the university stands on any other or different ground from other creditors of the state."

The Jurist also publishes what appears to be an important telegraph case, Hubbard v. Western Union Telegraph Co., decided by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. This was an action to recover damages for the neglect of the defendant and its servants to transmit the following message from Port Huron, Michigan, to Milwaukee, Wisconsin: "Buy twenty thousand, seller, June, pay telegraph there." It admitted that the message meant, and would have been understood by plaintiff's agent, to buy twenty thousand bushels No. 2 wheat. The court below having found the issues for the defendant, and the supreme court holding that the judgment below was wrong, but that the plaintiff was only entitled to nominal damages, court refused to reverse the judgment. According to the syllabus, the court hold, that telegraph companies are not insurers, and do not guarantee the delivery of all messages with entire accuracy, and against all contingencies; but are held to ordinary care and vigilance in the performance of their duties, and to answer for the neglect and omission of duty of their servants and agents. This rule applies also to night dispatches. To this case the editor appends a long note, consisting, principally, of a quotation from the opinion in Tyler v. W. U. T. Co., 60 Ill. 431.

The Jurist also publishes the opinion of Snyder, J., in McCormick. v. East Saint Louis, Circuit Court of Madison County, Illinois, with the following syllabus:

1. The ordinance of the city of East St. Louis, providing that the committee of ways and means of the common council, "be authorized to adjust and compromise any claims of persons holding certificates of indebtedness issued by the metropolitan police commissioners of the city of East St. Louis," etc., considered, and held void.

2. It is a well established rule of law that where power is given to municipal authorities, in express language, to become indebted, the terms and purposes of the grant will measure the extent of the power.

3. The provision of the charter held a restriction upon the power of the council, and that any contract made, or attempted to be made, looking to the payment of the metropolitan police scrip, was as unauthorized and prohibited by the charter.

The Jurist concludes the number with an opinion of Mr. Attorney-General Edsall, of Illinois, holding that, under the laws now in force in that state, assaults, and assault and battery, are indictable in the circuit court, as well as punishable before justices in a summary manner.

The Albany Law Journal, for December 5, contains a short article on the Taxation of Mortgages, in which it examines four California cases: Savings, etc., Society v. Austin, 46 Cal. 415; People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 432; People v. Wartenby, 38 Cal. 461; Lick v. Austin, 43 Cal. 590.

It has an editorial article on Action by Parent for Seduction of Minor Daughter, which is directed to the elucidation of two points, namely: Whether the daughter, at the time of the seduction, is sufficiently in the service of the parent to enable him to maintain the action; and whether a mother can maintain the action, the father of the daughter being dead. The following cases are examined: Kennedy v. Shea, 110 Mass. 147; Griffiths v. Tetgen, 15 C. B. 344; Rist v Faux, 4 B. & S. 409; S. C., 11 W. R. 918; Ogden v. Lancashire, 15 W. R. 158; Thompson v. Ross, 5 H. & N. 16; Manley v. Field, 7 C. B. (N. S.) 96; Hedges v. Tagg, 7 L. R. Exch. 283; S. C. 20 W. R. 976: Bartley v. Richtmeyer, 4 N. Y. 38; Sargent v. Dennison, 5 Cow. 106; Simpson v. Busk, 5 Lans. 337; Damon v. Moore, Ib. 454: Gray v. Deerland, 51 N. Y. 424; Furman v. Van Size, 10 Albany Law Journal, 251; and Lampman v. Hammond, 3 N. Y. Sup. Court Rep. 293.

The same journal publishes a synopsis of an opinion of the New York Court of Appeals of great local importance—Farmer's Bank v. Hale—holding that, under a statute of that state, where state banks take usurious interest, the contract is void in toto, and not merely as to the interest. In National Bank v. Lamb, 50 N. Y. 95, the same rule was declared with reference to loans of national banks doing business in that state, the court of appeals holding that such banks are subject to the usury laws of the state. And the court now say they are bound to apply the same principle to the state banks, in accordance with chapter 163 of the laws of 1870, § 2, which reads as follows: "It is hereby declared that the true intent and meaning of this act is to place the banking associations organized and doing business as aforesaid, on an equality, in the particulars in this act referred to, with the national banks organized under the acts of Congress," etc. Three of the seven judges, Johnson, Grover and Andrews, dissented.

The same journal publishes a case of far greater importance in banking law, in which the New York Court of Appeals holds that where a check is presented to the bank, on which it is drawn, for certification, and the bank certifies it "good," the bank does no more than guarantee that the drawer has sufficient funds in the bank to meet the check, and that these funds shall not be withdrawn until the check is presented for payment It does not guarantee the genuineness of the signature, nor that the check has not been altered, nor in any other way the honesty of the persons through whose hands it has passed. In our judgment this is the more sensible and beneficial view of the question. It is such a decision as a court composed of intelligent business men, familiar with the customs of banking, would have made. It also tends to preserve the useful and convenient practice of certifying checks, which, under the contrary decision of the question, would be broken down. The editor of our able contemporary, the Daily Register, says of this case: "The responsibility of a bank which certifies to the goodness of a check drawn upon it, has at last been defined by our court of final adjudication. When a bank marks a check "good," it only certifies, in law, that the drawer of the check has funds sufficient to meet that check in bank. That is to say, it does not guarantee the correctness of the figures which set forth the amount drawn for. A raised check, say from $10 to $100, or from $60 to $600, although marked "good" by a bank, is good only for the genuine amount drawn for. This is the law, and although not heretofore authoritatively announced, it is not new.

"If the banks have got into a loose habit of certifying to checks, that is no reason why the law should be changed to accomodate them. Suppose the check is raised after the certification of the bank upon which it is drawn—who should be the loser? Not the bank certifying, for its certificate has been altered. It has no means of defence until the check comes back for payment, then it may or may not discover the fraud. If it discovers it, surely it cannot be held responsible for the fraud; if it does not discover it, and pays the fraudulent amount, it must be the loser. The bank receiving such check on deposit, or paying it, has, in the first instance, a chance to detect the fraud and the perpetrator thereof, and, in the second, the right to refuse payment. This decision will do good, by making the banks more careful in handling these certified checks."

The Chicago Legal News, for December 5, publishes a very important opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Mr. Justice Hunt, in the case of Home Insurance Co. v. Morse, error to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, holding that the statute of Wisconsin which enacts that a corporation organized in another state shall not transact business within its limits, unless it stipulates in advance that it will not remove into the federal courts any suit that may be commenced against it by a citizen of Wisconsin, is repugnant to the constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, and is illegal and void. Waite, C. J., and Davis, J., dissent. The question is one of great importance, and will be quoted by some as an evidence of a tendency on the part of the federal courts to extend and strengthen their jurisdiction, and to interfere unwarrantably with the rights of the states; while on the other hand it will be pointed to as a triumph over the exclusive and tribal legislation which many of the states have directed against foreign corporations and foreign enterprises.

The Legal News also publishes an important opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Sprott v. United States, appealed from the Court of Claims. That court made the following finding of facts and conclusions of law:

Digitized by Google

1. At different times during the years of 1864 and 1865, large quantities of cotton were purchased by the agents of the confederate states, for the treasonable purpose of maintaining the war of rebellion against the government of the United States. Of cotton thus purchased by various agents in Claiborne county, Mississippi, three hundred bales were sold to the claimant by one agent, in March, 1865, for ten cents a pound, in the currency of the United States. The sale was made by the agent as of cotton belonging to the confederate states, and it was understood by the claimant, at the time of the purchase, to be the property of the rebel government, and was purchased as such. The agent had been specially instructed by the confederate government "to sell any and all cotton he could, for the purpose of raising money to purchase munitions of war, and supplies for the confederate army;" but the purpose of the sale was not disclosed to the claimant, whose purpose was not to aid the confederate states, buying the cotton at the market value, and regarding it as a mere business transaction of "cotton for cash." The cotton was delivered to him at the time when the money was paid, he then being a resident of Claiborne county, within the confederate lines.

2. The cotton was captured in May, 1865, and the proceeds, or some portion thereof, are in the treasury.

And the Court of Claims, upon the foregoing facts, decides as conclusions of law:

1. The government of the confederate states was an unlawful assemblage, without corporate power to take, hold or convey a valid title to property, real or personal.

2. The claimant was chargeable with notice of the treasonable intent of the sale by the confederate government, and the transaction was forbidden by the laws of the United States, and wholly void, so that the claimant acquired no title to the property which is the subject of suit.

This decision the supreme court affirm, resting their judgment on the second proposition. Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion. Mr. Justice Clifford and Mr. Justice Davis concurred in the result, but not in the reasoning of the opinion of the court, and Mr. Justice Field dissented.

The Legal News also publishes an opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, in Maltman v. Williamson, holding, that when goods are sold for cash, and the vendee fails to pay for them on delivery, interest may be collected from the time of the delivery of the goods.

It also concludes, from its last week's number, its report of the case of Hewitt v. Long, involving the question of the right of the father and mother, as against each other, to the custody of their minor children, publishing in this number the dissenting opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Breese, in which Sheldon, J., concurs.

In the Legal Intelligencer, of December 4, we note the following decisions:

Neill v. Gallagher, Common Pleas of Philadelphia: 1. All the houses in a certain row were, less than twenty years ago, built five feet back from the building line, but there was no express agreement among the property-owners to this effect. Held, that a special injunction would not be granted to prevent defendant from erecting a bay window on the five feet recess.

2. The mere setting back of a building from the line of a street by the owner, for his own convenience or comfort, is not of itself a dedication of the land thrown out, and he may reclaim it at will.

And the following of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania:

Appeal of the executors of John M. Porter, deceased: A suitable tombstone on the grave of a decedent, is a legitimate item of credit in the accounts of an executor; especially so in a case like the present one.

Adams v. The Pittsburgh Ins. Company: The evidence must be clear, uncontradictory and distinct, to establish a custom or usage in a particular port warranting the captain of a steamboat, under the direction of a part owner, to bind the owners of vessels navigating the Ohio and its tributaries, for the amount of a premium note for the insurance of the boat, executed by the captain.

Ballantine v. White: 1. The 4th section of the act of April 22d, 1856, in reference to declarations of trusts, etc., being in writing, does not prevent the admission of parol evidence to show that a transfer, though in form an absolute conveyance, was intended to be a mortgage.

2. The "equity of redemption," referred to in the 6th section of the same act, as to the limitations of suits, etc., is confined to such an equity "after re-entry made for any condition broken," and does not apply to the equity of redemption of a mortgage.

3 A wife may testify on behalf of her husband under the act of 1869, and the fact that she may, on cross-examination, be compelled to testify against him, does not disqualify her.

4. A refusal to enter a non-suit is not the subject of review in the supreme court.

5. After testimony had been given to show that certain receipts had been altered, the evidence of experts should have been admitted to prove that the alterations were not made at the same time with the body of the instrument

6. In equitable ejectments the judge acts as chancellor with the assistance of the jury; how far he may be called on to exercise his discretion upon the credibility of witnesses, where the parties testify, and their testimony is in direct conflict, not decided.

The Dollar Savings Bank v. Bennett: A mere verbal agreement by a purchaser at a sheriff's sale with his own money, that he will hold the premises in trust for the defendant, neither vests any equitable estate in the defendant, nor does it give any ground for an action, being a mere nudum pactum.

Hageman v. The People's Fire Insurance Co.: A judgment entered in conformity with the charter of this company, on a premium note, is a lien against the property insured.

Legal News and Notes.

—AN exchange states that the revised statutes of the United States, by throwing out obsolete statutes, conflicting provisions, etc., render the construction of the tariff laws an easy question now, and the quibbles and technicalities set up by importers, under the old statutes, are avoided under the present simple and comprehensible compilation.

—INTERNATIONAL RAILWAY CONGRESS.—The Swiss government has presented notes at London, Berlin, Paris, St. Petersburg, Vienna and Rome, proposing an international congress of all railway administrations in Europe. Four points are, it is stated, proposed for deliberation, viz: (1.) The limits of the responsibility of the company which originally receives the goods for a distinct destination and of the companies which transport the goods afterward. (2.) What is to be considered a competent tribunal in case of disputes between the diverse interest? (3.) The establishment of a uniform procedure to ascertain the damages caused to goods during the time they are in the keeping of the railway companies. (4.) The acceptance, as a general rule, that the company which finally delivers the goods shall be responsible to the receiver, receiving, of course, its rights as against the companies which preceded it in the carrying.—[Chicago Railway Review.

—JUDGE DURELL has tendered his resignation, or at least written it out, to take effect December 1. In an interview with a reporter of the New York Herald, the Judge defends his "midnight order," as follows: "Congress passed, as you know, the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. Afterward was brought forward by Mr. Morton, as I understand, in the United States Senate, the enforcement act, which increased the powers given to the United States Circuit Court, and gave it jurisdiction both in law and equity. Now in the fall election of 1872, in Louisiana, I was required to act under that statute. The United States Court has certain duties, and among others is that of the appointment of commissioners to watch over the polls. I was requried to go over and open that court by Judge Woods, of that circuit court, he having been authorized so to do by the amended enforcement act, and it was within his jurisdiction to require the United States Judge to perform these duties. That went on and was continued until the day of election. After the polls were closed and the day of election passed away, Mr. Kellogg, the republican candidate for governor, filed a bill in chancery, on the chancery side of the circuit court for the district of Louisiana. The object of this was the preservation of evidence. This bill alleged, among other matters, that a large number of citizens of the state of Louisiana, who had a right to cast their votes at the gubernatorial election, had been excluded from voting, on account of their color and former condition. It stated further, that the returns were held by unlawful parties. It asked, then, that the proof as to these facts might be taken and deposited in the office of the clerk of the court. Such proof was to be used at any action of the law for the office of governor. At the same time, a certified copy of all the returns had to be taken for the office of governor at that election. I gave certain interlocutory orders, for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the bill, and also for the purpose of securing the evidence to be used in any action of the law. I declared, among other things, that the state court had declared certain men were the returning court, and I followed the state court for that. And here I stopped. Nothing more was done. Nothing else had been done, except running a race for the governorship. Mr. Warmouth would not give up the returns. If they had obeyed my orders and had handed those returns to my clerk, there would have been an end, so far, of the United States war, certainly. I took possession of the state-house (Mechanics' Institute, it was, in fact), in order to get at the returns. They ran away with them and they have not yet been produced. Now, I understand, they say they are in Baltimore. This case was conducted according to the proceedings in other cases. Now, that is all I had to do with it."

This explanation is certainly cool. The idea of a United States District Judge demanding the returns of the votes cast at an election for governor of a state! Judge Durell will have to explain further, in order to lift from his judicial reputation the cloud of infamy with which his extra-judicial and most outrageous conduct has enveloped it.

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor. } ST. LOUIS, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1874. { SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. }

A GOOD SUGGESTION.—The communication from "C.," in another column, embodies some excellent suggestions in regard to a mode by which lawyers may keep their libraries intact, and at the same time oblige each other by lending books when required. Those who have had valuable liabraries depleted by the inevitable book-borrower (and who has not?) will read C.'s suggestions with interest, and, we doubt not, with profit.

A PARTING WORD.—We shall probably not have an opportunity of addressing our readers again through these columns during the present year, and as some of them will not be with us during the coming year, we tender to such a parting shake of the hand, and to all our best wishes for a merry Christmas and a happy New Year. In looking back, we see that we promised several things when we began, which we have not fulfilled. We also confess that we have been somewhat hasty at times in expressing opinions, although we trust we have been honest and not dull. We hope to do better next year, and shall endeavor to weed out some of our errors and not let them go to seed. We also hope, with the experience of the past year, to make the JOURNAL, during the coming year, more useful, and hence more deserving of the patronage of the profession.

OUR NEXT NUMBER.—We notified our readers some time since that we should close the present year with number 53. The unexpected length of the index, the fact that we publish with it a complete table of all cases reported, digested or cited, and the further fact that were we to issue a fifty-third number, it would fall on the first day of the new year, the day of publication of our first number of the second volume, induces us to print it as number 52 instead of number 53. Should any of our readers feel disposed to complain at this, we would remind them that we have published during the year several numbers of extra size, thus giving them thirteen pages more reading matter than they would get in 52 numbers of our regular size. Our next number, therefore will consist of an index and table of cases, and as it will not be very entertaining reading, our readers will not be disappointed if it does not appear on the precise day.

Foreign Larcenies.

The Monthly Western Jurist, for December (Bloomington, Ill.), contains an article under the caption "Larcenies in Foreign Countries not Punishable in the United States." This article is chiefly valuable from the fact that it sets out at full length the opinion of the Supreme Court of Ohio, in Stanley v. The State MS., a case which was decided at the November, 1873, term of that court. This case contains a very full and able discussion of the question, and collates a large number of authorities, the result of which seems to be:

1. That where goods are stolen upon the high seas and carried into England, the thief cannot be convic'ed in the courts of the common law in England. 13 Coke, 53; 3 Inst. 113; 1 Hawk. P. C. ch. 19, § 52.

2. That where goods are stolen in another sovereignty and carried into England, the thief cannot be convicted in England. Regina v. Madge, 9 Car. & P. 29.

3. That formerly where goods were stolen without the body of a county of England, but within the United Kingdom or the Provinces, and carried into England, the thief could not be convicted in England. As where goods were stolen in the island of Jersey: Rex. v. Prowes, 1 Moody C. C. 349. Or in Scotland: 2 East P. C. 772, ch. 16, § 156. But this has been changed by statute, so that the thief may be prosecuted in any county where found with goods in his possession, stolen by him in any part of the United Kingdom. 13 Geo. 3, ch. 31, § §4 and 7; 8 Geo. 4 ch. 29, § 76.

4. That the following cases hold that where goods are stolen in one of the United States, and carried by the thief into another, the courts of the latter state have jurisdiction to convict him of larceny: Hamilton v. The State, 11 Ohio, 435; The State v. Ellis, 3 Conn. 185; The State v. Bartlett, 11 Vt. 650; The State v. Underwood, 49 Maine, 181; Watson v. The State, 36 Miss. 593; The State v. Johnson, 2 Oregon, 115; The State v. Bennett, 14 Iowa, 479; Ferrell v. Commonwealth, 1 Duvall, 153; Commonwealth v. Collins, 1 Mass. 116; and several subsequent cases in Massachusetts.

5. That the following cases hold the contrary: People v. Gardner, 2 Johns. 477; People v. Schenk, 2 Johns. 479; The State v. Le Blanch, 2 Vroom, 82; Simmons v. Commonwealth, 5 Binn. 617; The State v. Brown, 1 Hayw. 100; Simpson v. The State, 4 Humph. 456; Beall v. The State, 15 Ind. 378; The State v. Reonnals, 14 La. An. 278. But this rule was afterwards changed in New York by statute.

6. That there are two cases which hold that where goods are stolen in a foreign country and brought into one of the United States, the courts of such state have jurisdiction to convict the thief of the larceny: The State v. Bartlett, 11 Vt. 650; The State v. Underwood, 49 Maine, 181.

7. That there are two cases in which this is denied: Comm. v. Uprichard, 3 Gray, 434, and Stanley v. The State, supra.

After collating at length the authorities, the court in Stanley's case reason the question as follows:

The judgment below is wrong, unless every act of the defendant, which was necessary to complete the offence, was committed within the state of Ohio and in violation of the laws thereof. This proposition is not disputed. It is conceded by the prosecution that the taking, as well as the removal of the goods animo furandi, must have occurred within the limits of Ohio. It is also conceded that the first taking, as well as the first removal of the goods alleged in this case to have been stolen, was at a place beyond the limits of the state, and within the jurisdiction of a foreign and independent sovereignty. Now, the doctrine of all the cases is that the original "taking" and the original asportation of the goods by the prisoner, must have been under such circumstances as constituted a larceny. If the possession of the goods by the defendant, before they were brought into this state, was a lawful possession, there would be no pretense that the conviction was proper. The same, if his possession was merely tortious. The theory of the law, upon which the propriety of the conviction is claimed, is based on the assumption that the property was stolen in Canada by the prisoner.

By what rule shall it be determined whether the acts of the prisoner, whereby he acquired the possession of the goods in Canada, constituted the crime of larceny? By the laws of this state? Certainly not. The criminal laws of this state have no extra-territorial operation. If the acts of the prisoner, whereby he came in possession of the property described in the indictment, were not inhibited by the laws of Canada, it is perfectly clear that he was not guilty of larceny there. It matters not that they were such as would have constituted larceny if the transaction had taken place in this state.

Shall the question whether or not the "taking" of the property by the prisoner was a crime in Canada, be determined by the laws of that country? If this be granted, then an act, which was an essential element in the combination of facts of which Stanley was found guilty, was in violation of the laws of Canada but not of this state; and it was because the laws of Canada were violated that the prisoner was convicted. If the laws of that country had been different, though the conduct of the prisoner had been the same, he could not have been convicted. I can see no way to escape this conclusion, and if it be correct, it follows that the acts of the prisoner in a foreign country, as well as his acts in this state, were essential elements in his offence; therefore, no complete offence was committed in this state against the laws thereof.

I have no doubt the legislature might make it a crime for a thief to bring into this state property stolen by him in a foreign country. And in order to convict of such crime, it would be necessary to prove the existence of foreign laws against larceny. The existence of such foreign laws would be an ingredient in the statutory offence. But that offence would not be larceny at common law, for the reason that larceny at common law contains no such element. It consists in taking and carrying away the goods of another person in violation of the rules of the common law, without reference to any other law or the laws of any other country.

It may be assumed that the laws of meum et tuum prevail in every country, whether civilized or savage. But this state has no concern in them further than to discharge such duties as are imposed upon it by the laws of nations, or through its connection with the general government, by treaty stipulations.

Our civil courts are open for the reclamation of property which may have been brought within our jurisdiction, in violation of the rights of the owner; but our criminal courts have no jurisdiction over offences committed against the sovereignty of foreign and independent states.

We are unable to perceive any substantial ground of distinction, with respect of this question, between larcenies committed in other states and those committed in a foreign country. With reference to the punishment of crimes against their own jurisdiction, the different states of the American Union seem as distinctively sovereign and independent, with reference to each other, as the state of Ohio is sovereign and independent with reference to the Dominion of Canada.

Power of the Judiciary to Control the Official Acts of Officers of the Executive Department of the Government.

We published some time since (ante, p. 401) a very important opinion of the Supreme Court of Texas, in the case of Bledsoe v. The International Railroad Company, involving the question whether the judiciary of that state has power to control by mandamus an official act of the comptroller, and resolving the question in the negative. The reasons on which that decision was based are still no doubt fresh in the minds of some of our readers. They were briefly these: that the office of comptroller is created by the constitution of the state; that by that instrument he is named one of the executive magistracy of the state, as fully as is the governor himself; and hence, that any attempt on the part of the judiciary to compel him to deviate from the course he chooses to take in the performance of an official act (although that act be, as many cases express it, a ministerial one merely, and one not involving an exercise of discretion) involves an invasion on the part of the judiciary of the jurisdiction and powers of a distinct, separate and co-ordinate department of the government.

Our readers will remember that this opinion was by a divided court, the opinion of the court having been delivered by a special judge, sitting (we believe) in the place of Mr. Justice Moore, who was incompetent by reason of having been of counsel in the case. It would be imagined that such a decision, however able the reasoning of the opinion delivered by the majority, would not put to rest a question of such importance. Accordingly we find that very soon after this decision had been pronounced, substantially the same question came before the court again in the case of Keuchler, Commissioner of the General Land Office of Texas, v. Wright. This was a suit by mandamus, instituted in 1871, by George W. Wright, to compel the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the State of Texas, to issue to him a patent to land which he had located and surveyed, by virtue of a land certificate for the unlocated balance issued to Henry Buckler, for 640 acres of land assigned in writing to said Wright by Eliza Higgins, widow of Henry Buckler, and her present husband, Wm. L. Higgins, and Isabella Buckler, claiming to be the widow and heir of Henry Buckler, to which written transfer of said certificate was attached the private acknowledgement of the said married woman, taken before a justice of the peace in the state of Arkansas. This land certificate was located and surveyed on lands known as the "State sections," within the Memphis, El Paso and Pacific Railroad reservation. The Commissioner appeared by the Attorney General, and demurred to the petition of Wright, and justified his refusal to issue the patent on the ground that the lands located and surveyed by Wright were, by the constitution and laws of the state in force, reserved from location by virtue of such certificate. The only evidence before the court was a certified copy of the papers on file in the General Land Office. The court below determined (the case being submitted to the court on the pleadings and on said certified copy of the papers in the Land Office) in favor of the plaintiffs, and awarded a peremptory mandamus against the commissioner, from which judgment an appeal was taken, and brought into the Supreme Court in 1872. This court, in 1872, delivered an opinion, and rendered a judgment reversing the judgment below and dismissing the suit. At the same term a rehearing was granted. In 1873 the Supreme Court delivered another opinion, sustaining the first, and confirming its own judgment already rendered in the case. At the same term, in 1873, another motion for rehearing was made by Wright, which was continued at another term, and the judgment suspended to await the determination of the motion for rehearing. The case, then, came before the present bench on a motion for a rehearing, and was again argued to enable the members of the court to decide upon the propriety of granting the motion. This a majority of the court united in refusing on the merits of the case, while asserting that the district court has jurisdiction to award a mandamus against the commissioner of the general land office, to compel him to perform a ministerial duty which is clearly enjoined by law.

When it is remembered that in Texas the office of commissioner of the general land office is created by the constitution, and that this officer is, equally with the governor and comptroller, a member of the executive magistracy of the state, the significance of this decision will be seen. It overrules Bledsoe v. The International Railroad Company, and establishes the principle that under the present constitution of Texas the district court has jurisdiction to award a mandamus against an officer of the executive department of the government, to compel the performance of official acts where the law does not make the performance of them discretionary with the officer. The opinion of the majority of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Moore, who, as above stated, did not sit in the Bledsoe case. His opinion will be found in the Chicago Legal News for November 21 and November 28. His opinion is long, embraces a very thorough citation of the adjudications bearing upon the question, and is very forcibly reasoned. Mr. Chief Justice Roberts dissented at great length, and in his opinion examines the question involved with an ability which, in our judgment, stamps him as one of the foremost jurists of the country. He examines a very great number of authorities with a searching discrimination, and expresses his views in forcible, and at times, in eloquent language. We have a copy of his opinion before us as published in the Houston Daily Telegraph for August 30.

Quite a number of decisions have been made by the American courts on the question here involved, some of them affirming, others denying the jurisdiction which the majority of the court in this case adjudge to exist. Some of these cases we have examined at length; others but hastily, and we doubt whether, since the original case of Marberry v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, the question has ever been more thoroughly considered than in this case.

The question involved is one of great difficulty, and powerful arguments may be brought to bear on both sides of it. In support of the jurisdiction it is urged that we live in a government of law, and that if any officer of the goverment, be he the governor himself, captiously refuses to perform a plain duty involving the rights of a citizen, such citizen ought not to be compelled to suffer the wrong, but ought to have redress in the judicial tribunals according to the law of the land. This argument is clearly stated, and an array of cases cited in support of it, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Moore, who uses the following language:

While it must be admitted no human government can be organized which will, in all instances, secure the citizen in the complete and perfect enjoyment of all his rights of person and property, and there must be an end of controversy somewhere, whether the result attained is what it should be or not, yet I cannot see that this is a reason why the citizen should be deprived of all remedy touching the matters of individual right depending upon the performance of a merely ministerial duty. The time-honored maxim, that there is a remedy for every wrong, if not true to the letter, is surely persuasive that an element of judicial power of so much importance, recognized from time immemorial by the courts of the country from which our jurisprudence is derived, and exercised under a similar constitutional provision to ours by the courts of every state in the union, is not denied to our courts. Northwestern N. C. R. Co. v. Jenkins, 65 N. C., 173; State v. Lawrence, 3 Kan. 95; State v. Secretary of State, 33 Mo. 293; People v. Smith, 43 Ill. 219; Hemmerick v. Hunter, 14 La. An. 221; State v. Wrotnowski, 17 La. An. 156; State v. Draper, 48 Mo. 213; Swan v. Buck, 40 Miss. 219; Swan v. Work, 24 Miss. 439; ex parte Pickett, 24 Ala. 91; ex parte Echols, 39 Ala. 698; State v. Bordelon, 6 La. An. 68; People v. Smith, 48 Ill. 219; People v. Secretary of State, 58 Ill. 90; Swan, Auditor, v. Josselyn, 14 S. & M. 106; Auditor v. Adams, 13 B. Monroe, 150; Douglas v. Hastings, 15 Wis. 75; Free Press Association v. Nichols, 45 Vt. 7; Bryan v. Collet, 15 Iowa, 538; Auditor v. Hardin, 8 B. Monr. 648. In the last two of these cases the same objections to the jurisdiction of the court, which has been relied upon here, where directly presented and lucidly discussed, and decided in favor of the jurisdictional right of the court to award the writ. To enquire into and determine as to matters of this character, and to prevent the rights of citizens from being "sported away" at the whim or caprice of officers in the exercise of merely ministerial duty, is plainly, in my opinion, the exercise of the judicial power conferred by the constitution. The court of England and America have always claimed and used it as such. The legislative and executive departments have at all times heretofore recognized and acquiesced in its exercise by the judicial department, even when it was not regulated and defind by statute.

On the other hand it is urged that litigation must end somewhere, and that it is a sufficient answer to all objections that exclusive jurisdiction has been vested by the constitution in an officer of the executive department of the government to perform certain acts and to decide certain questions, and that no jurisdiction has been expressly granted to any other tribunal by that instrument to review his decisions, or control his discretion in the exercise of his official functions; and that the assumption of such a power by the judiciary would be an invasion by one co-ordinate department of the government of the powers delegated exclusively to another, which might lead to unseemly conflicts of jurisdiction and even to anarchy. It is urged with much force that courts are but men; that men are greedy of power, and that courts are greedy of jurisdiction; and that if the boundary is once passed which separates the province of the courts from that of the other co-ordinate departments of the government, there are no well-defined barriers to check their aggressions. "There must of necessity," said Mr. Chief Justice Roberts in his dissenting opinion, "be a finality—a finality in the determination of the rights of individuals, in whatever departments they may arise or pertain to, and some man, or set of men, must make the final determination. In a despotism, such one man is easily pointed out. In a republican state, such as ours, wherein all of the powers of government are divided into three distinct departments, there must be a final determination of each department for itself, of all such matters as are assigned to it in the division. Otherwise there is no division—no binding, effective and 'distinct' division of powers."

We incline in opinion with the chief justice. His reasoning strongly resembles that of Mr. Justice Cooley in the case of People v. Badgley (ante, 299), and seems to our mind conclusive. The case of an office created, and its duties defined by an act of the legislature, may rest on somewhat different grounds. But we perceive no substantial distinction with respect to this question, between the case of the governor of a state and that of any other officer of the executive department thereof whose office is created and whose powers are defined by the organic law. Unless the same organic law has granted to another jurisdiction power to control such officer, he is above control. "Were the courts to go so far," said Mr. Justice Cooley in the case of People v. Badgley, supra, "they would break away from those checks and balances of government which were meant to be checks of co-operation, and not of antagonism or mastery, and would concentrate in their own hands something at least of the power which the people, either directly or by the action of their representatives, decided to entrust to the other departments of the government."

Constitutional Law—Release of State's Lien upon Railroads.

SILAS WOODSON AND H. CLAY EWING v. URIEL A. MURDOCK AND LUTHER C. CLARK.

Mr. Justice MILLER dissenting.

I cannot agree to the judgment of the court, and think the principle involved of sufficient importance to justify an expression of my views.

For many years previous to the late civil war, the principal railroads in the state of Missouri had been the objects of the special care of the people, and had received large pecuniary aid from the state. This aid had been given at various times and in divers sums, in the shape of the bonds of the state, to the extent, in the aggregate, of twenty-five millions of dollars or more. For these sums, which were treated as loans, the railroad companies had consented to statutory liens in the nature of mortgages, with conditions to pay the bonds of the state, interest and principal, as they fell due. If the terms of the loan were not precisely as I have stated in all cases, they were substantially so, and any variations in special instances do not affect the qestion under consideration.

The state of Missouri was, almost as much as any state in the Union, the seat of the worst calamities of that war. Its people were divided among themselves; regualar armies marched and counter-marched over its soil, and each side used or abused the railroads to their utmost capacity when within their control. But, above all, the local guerilla warfare, to which the disputed control of her territory and the divided allegiance of her people subjected them, was the cause of immense destruction and damage of her railroads. These companies, therefore, emerged from the war with their roads in a state of repair which hardly admitted of use, and the rolling-stock so deteriorated that new supplies were indispensable. Their credit was low, their means exhausted, and their property apparently worth but little. They were unable to meet their obligations to the state, and were largely in arrears for the interest on the state bonds.

The state itself was in little better condition. To the heavy burdens of increased taxation, imposed by the federal government to support the war and to pay its debt, was now added the nenecessity of paying the interest on the large debt of the state incurred in aid of the railroad companies.

The question forced itself upon the people of the state and the railroad companies, what is to be done in this emergency? The people of the state felt the injustice, in their over-burdened condition, of being called on to pay, without aid from the corporations, the debt incurred for their benefit, and this hardship was not diminished by the consideration that the roads were owned and controlled by stockholders, very few of whom were citizens of Missouri. The railroad companies felt that if their roads were to be made capable of accomplishing the purpose of their creation, all their means and all their credit must be devoted to repairing and rebuilding the road and refurnishing the rolling-stock.

The railroad companies and that part of the people of the state who felt a stronger interest in the roads, appealed to the generosity of the legislature to relieve the roads from the burden of the debt to the state. Those who believed that the credit of the state and the relief of the people from the burden of excessive taxation were of paramount importance, thought the state should relieve herself, as far as possible, by enforcing her lien at the expense of the stockholders, and by sale of the roads, realize all they would bring, and, appropriating this to the payment of the bonds of the state, diminish to that extent the taxation necessary to pay the interest on her large public debt.

The appeal for leniency to the railroad companies had many and able advocates, and was warmly urged by them, and assisted by all the appliances which that class of corporations use with so much effect. The legislature had in several instances released liens altogether on some roads, and had postponed liens to let in subsequent ones, thus showing what might be expected of that body.

It was in the midst of the discussion of this question that the members of the constitutional convention of 1865 were elected, and in the face of the difficulties which it presented, that the convention assembled.

They took cognizance of the matter. They understood that they were expected to adopt some plan of relief, and whatever plan was adopted must be based mainly, if not exclusively, on one or the other of the two propositions we have named. We are not called upon to give judicial construction to what they did, and, by all the rules of sound interpretation, it must be done in view of the condition of affairs which their action was intended to relieve, and of the public sentiment which they intended to represent.

It was very clear, then, it is equally clear now, looking alone to what was incorporated into the constitution by that convention, that wholly rejected the idea of leniency to the railroad companies, and that its sole care was to conserve the pecuniary interest of the state.

As the constitution stood when the convention assembled, it was in the power of the legislature — of any legislature — at any time, under the pressure of any influence, to release the lien of the state on the roads, or to make any other compromise of the claim of the state. If the convention was fully determined against this policy, it was their first duty to take this power from the legislative body altogether. The first thing to be done was to forbid the legislature from granting this relief. In the effort to carry out this purpose the convention placed in the body of the constitution, article IV., section 15, the declaration that "the general assembly shall have no power whatever to release the lien held by the state upon any railroad."

It seems to me strange that this provision should be the subject of a divided opinion as to its meaning. The release here meant could not have been the execution of a technical instrument called a release. No such absurdity can be imputed to the convention, because if the debt was paid, or otherwise discharged, so that the lien no longer existed, the making of such an instrument was of no value to any one. The thing prohibited was the discharge or remission in any shape of the specific lien which the state had on the roads for the payment of the bonds she had advanced or loaned to the companies. To make this more emphatic, all power whatever on this subject was taken away. No pressing exigency, no motive however pure or generous, and no consideration even of pecuniary wisdom in which the legislature might indulge or believe was to justify this discharge of the lien which the state held as security for her advances. How can it be maintained in the face of this, that while the legislature could not release from motives of grace, and for the purpose of gratuity, it could release on a purpose of compromise, by accepting one-third or one-half of the debt secured by the lien? If one-third could be accepted, then one-tenth. If five millions could be accepted when ten were due, then five dollars could be accepted. It is to be borne in mind that we are considering the constitutional power of the legislature to release the lien, and on this question we are not at liberty to consider whether it acted wisely or reasonably. If they could release at all, or for any consideration, the court cannot say they have exceeded their power. But the constitution seems to place all this beyond question by saying it shall not have any power whatever to do this thing.

The work of the convention was, however, to be submitted to a vote of the people. If it received a majority of the votes cast, it became the fundamental law of the land. Otherwise it passed for nothing. Other propositions were submitted separately, and might be adopted or rejected without hazarding the whole instrument. But so important did the convention deem this provision that they put it into the body of the new constitution, so that the latter could not be adopted without including the former.

If, however, the question of releasing the road from its debt to the state was thus settled in the negative, there still remained the question of the present enforcement of the lien by sale or otherwise. This question was left by the convention to a vote of the people, in a separate ordinance, which might be adopted or rejected without defeating the constitution itself, but which, if adopted, became part of the constitution.

Both the constitution and this ordinance were submitted at the same time, and both were adopted and became part of the fundamental law of the land at the same time. This ordinance throws a flood of light on the intention of the men who framed the constitution in adopting the section we have just discussed. It imposed a tax of ten per cent. on the gross receipts of the three principal roads from October, 1864, to October, 1868, and fifteen per cent. thereafter; to be devoted to the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds loaned by the state; and it required that if either of said companies neglected or refused to pay said tax, the general assembly should provide by law for the sale of that road. The fifth section of this ordinance is as follows:

"Whenever the state shall become the purchaser of any railroad or other property, or the franchises sold as hereinbefore provided for, the general assembly shall provide by law in what manner the same shall be sold for the payment of the indebtedness of the railroad company in default; but no railroad or other property or franchises purchased by the state shall be restored to any such company until it shall have first paid, in money or in Missouri state bonds, or in bonds guaranteed by this state, all interest due from said company, and all interest thereafter accruing shall be paid semi-annually in advance; and no sale or other disposition of any such railroad or other property or their franchises shall be made without reserving a lien upon all the property and franchises thus sold or disposed of, for all sums remaining unpaid; and all payments therefor shall be made in money or in the bonds or other obligations of this state."

The manner in which this ordinance was put to the people is significant. The ballot was to be, "shall the railroads pay their bonds?" "Yes." "Shall the railroads pay their bonds?" "No." The former was a vote for adopting the ordinance; the latter was a vote against it. It is thus seen that if this ordinauce was adopted, both the convention and the people were in earnest in their determination not to release any claim the state had in those companies. The peculiar provision of the above section makes this very clear. If the state became the purchaser the legislature should provide for the manner of its resale; but in no event was it to be restored by resale or otherwise to the company who had owned it, until that company had first payed in money, or bonds of the state of Missouri, all the accrued interest due from said company; and all interest thereafter to accrue was to be paid in advance semi-annually. It was also provided that no sale or other disposition of such railroad should be made without reserving a lien upon all the property and franchises thus sold or disposed of for all sums remaining unpaid.

The sale or disposition here spoken of had reference to a sale to other parties than the defaulting company. And even in that case the ordinance provided that none should be made which did not secure the state for all her liabilities on account of the road. The clause can have no other meaning but this, though it is ably argued that it means such part of the consideration of the new sale as may be on credit. But, taking the constitutional provision, the prohibtion in the ordinance against a restoration of the roads without payment of what is due, and security for what is to become due, it seems to me hardly to admit of a doubt that in no event was the road to pass from the control of the state, without security against any loss by reason of these bonds. But however this may be, the constitutional prohibtion against releasing the lien, the provisions of the ordinance for the levy of a severe tax on the gross receipts, the direction for a sale if it was not paid, and the two provisions against restoration it to the same company until full payment, indicate to my mind the unmistakable determination of the convention and the people that the companies should, in the language of the prescribed ballot, "pay their bonds,"—pay them in full,—or lose their roads, their property and franchises.

The answer made to all this is, that while the legislature could not release the lien they could not remit the debt. That while they could not restore the road to the same company after the state had bought it in, they could sell to the company the debt which that company owed the state at any price it chose. That while the state could not release the lien by any legislative act, it could compromise or sell the debt, and thus defeat, destroy, or part with that lien.

It is said the convention intended to prohibit the legislature from dealing as it chose with the debt, it could easily have said so, instead of using the word lien. If the convention had said that the legislature shall have no power to discharge the debt without full payment, it could then be argued with much more force that the lien might be released though the debt could not be touched. On the other hand, so long as the lien remained the debt must remain, for there could be no lien without the debt. It seems to me, therefore, that the convention used the stronger and better term, the one which included both, and which expressed precisely what they meant, namely, that both the debt and the lien of the debt should remain inviolate except by payment. If there could be any doubt of this, the form of submission of the ordinance on which the people voted, that the "roads should pay their bonds," makes it too clear for dispute.

But of what avail are constitutional restrictions of legislative power, or legislative restrictions of municipal power, if they are disregarded by the legislatures and municipalities?

It may be said that there remains to the people the protection of the courts. But language is at best a very imperfect instrument in the expression of thought, and the fundamental principles of government found in constitutions must necessarily be declared in terms very general, because they must be very comprehensive.

The ingenuity of causists and linguists, the nice criticism of able counsel, the zeal which springs from a large pecuniary interest, and the appeal of injured parties against the bad faith of the legislatures who violate the constitution, are easily invoked, and their influence pursuasive with the courts, as they always must be.

And if language as plain as that we have been considering, a purpose so firmly held and clearly expressed is to be fritted away by construction, then the courts themselves become but feeble barriers to legislative will and legislative corruption, and the interest of the people, which alone is to suffer, has but little to hope from the safeguards of written constitutions.

These instruments themselves, supposed to be the peculiar pride of the American people, and the great bulwark to personal and public rights, must fall rapidly into disrepute if they are found to be efficient only for the benefit of the rich and powerful, and the absolute majority on any subject will seek to enforce their views without regard to those restrictions on legislative power which are used only to their prejudice.

My brother Davis concurs in this dissent.

Burglary—Larceny—Effect of Acquittal of One of Two Felonies Charged in the Separate Counts of an Indictment.

BELL AND MURRAY v. THE STATE.

Supreme Court of Alabama, July Term, 1874.

Present, Hon. T. M. PETERS, Chief Justice.
" " R. C. BRICKELL, Associate Justice.

1. Rev. Code of Alabama, § 3695—What Averment in Indictment under, Constitutes Charge of Grand Larceny and not of Burglary.—Under § 3695 of the Revised Code, a count in an indictment which charges that the defendants "broke into and entered" a certain described building mentioned in that section, and "feloniously took and carried away" certain specified personal property of a third person, "of the value of more than one hundred dollars," is a count for grand larceny and not for burglary. To constitute a good count for burglary, there should have been an averment that the breaking and entry were "with intent to steal or to commit a felony."

2. Same—What Count Charges Burglary Only.—A count which charges that the defendants "broke into and entered" a certain described building, included in § 3695 of the revised code, "with the intent to steal," charges burglary only, and under such a count there can be no conviction for grand larceny.

3. Same—What Count Charges both Burglary and Grand Larceny.—Under a count charging that the defendants "broke into and entered" a certain described building, mentioned in § 3695 of the revised code, "with the intent to steal," and "feloniously took and carried away" certain specified articles of personal property of a specified third person, "of the value of more than one hundred dollars," there may be a conviction for either or both of the offences charged.

4. Conviction for Grand Larceny and Burglary had under One Count—What Punishment Awarded.—Where there is a conviction of both burglary and grand larceny charged in the same count, but one punishment should be awarded.

5. Merger—What Offences not Subject to Doctrine of.—Burglary and grand larceny being, under the provisions of the revised code, distinct felonies of the same grade and subject to the same nature of punishment, are not subject to the doctrine of merger.

6. Conviction of One of Two Felonies Charged in Separate Counts of Indictment—Effect of, as to Felony not Passed on by Jury.—A verdict finding the defendants guilty of burglary on the trial of an indictment charging, in separate counts, both burglary and grand larceny, is tatamount to an acquittal of grand larceny, and thereafter expunges that charge from the indictment.

7. Same—Acquittal, by what not Impaired.—The acquittal thus obtained is final, and not impaired by a judgment rendered by the appellate court, on the defendants' appeal, reversing the conviction for burglary and remanding the cause for further proceedings.

8. New Trial on Reversal—On what Charge Defendant is Liable to be Retried.—The acquittal of grand larceny on the first trial being final, and in contemplation of law obliterating that charge from the indictment, takes away any legal foundation for a verdict on the second trial, finding the defendants "guilty of grand larceny, as charged in the indictment."

9. Same—What will Operate an Acquittal.—Such a verdict is a nullity, and is no legal reason for discharging the jury from their deliberations on the charge of burglary, the only one remaining in the indictment. If the jury are discharged because of the rendition of this void verdict, without the consent of the defendants, the discharge operates an acquittal of the burglary.

10. Acquittal—When Supreme Court will Order Discharge of Defendants from Custody on Reversal of Judgment of Lower Court.—In the case at bar, defendants having been acquitted of grand larceny on the first trial, and the unauthorized discharge of the jury, on the second trial, being tantamount to an acquittal of the charge of burglary, the whole indictment was disposed of, and the defendants thereby entitled to their discharge. Such a motion having been made and overruled in the court below, the supreme court, on appeal, reversed the judgment and sentence of the court below, and caused the appropriate order to be entered in this court, discharging the defendants.

Appeal from the City Court of Montgomery.

Tried before Hon. JOHN D. CUNNINGHAM.

The indictment in this case contained four counts. The first count was nolle prossed. The second count charges that the defendants, Bell and Murray, "broke into, and entered, a building which it described, in which "goods, merchandise, trunks, silverware, etc., were at the time kept for deposit, with the intent to steal," against the peace, etc., etc. The third count charged that the defendants "broke into, and entered, a building," described in the count, in which merchandise, silverware, trunks, etc., "were at the time kept for deposit, and feloniously took and carried away" certain specified articles of personal property, "of the value of more than one hundred dollars, the property of Mrs. Georgia E. Saffold," against the peace, etc. The fourth count was identical with the third, with the exception that it charged that the breaking and entering were done "with the intent to steal."

At the spring term, 1873, of the city court, the defendants having gone to trial on plea of not guilty, were convicted of burglary. The verdict of the jury was, "we, the jury, find the defendants, Richard Bell and George Murray, guilty of burglary." The judgment entry, after reciting the empanneling of the jury on the 26th of March, 1873, the defendants' plea, etc., and the verdict of the jury, concludes, "and the said defendants were remanded to jail to await the sentence of the court." The record shows that on the 2d of April, 1873, the court sentenced the defendants in accordance with the verdict. There is nothing in the record or bill of exceptions to show that the defendants either consented or objected to the discharge of the jury.

The criminating evidence against the defendants on that trial, was the recent and unexplained possession of the stolen property, taken at the time of the burglary, which property Bell and Murray were endeavoring to sell under very suspicious circumstances at the time of their arrest. The defendants appealed to the supreme court, which "reversed and annulled the judgment and sentence of said city court," and remanded the cause "to the said city court for further proceedings therein," on the ground that the court below erred in not allowing the defendants a peremptory challenge to a juror. See the case reported 50 Ala. 675, which, for convenience of citation, has been called Murray and Bell v. The State.

At the spring term, 1873, of the city court, when the case was again called for trial, the defendants pleaded their joint and separate plea of autrefois acquit as to each and all the charges of grand larceny contained in the several counts of the indictment. This plea was, in short, by consent, and was based upon the verdict and matters and things of record on the former trial, including the bill of exceptions then reserved, and the judgment of reversal rendered by the supreme court. The court sustained a demurrer to the plea, and the defendants pleaded not guilty to the indictment, and went to trial on issue joined by the state on that plea. By consent, the testimony contained in the bill of exceptions, reserved in the former trial, was introduced in evidence, and that was all the evidence offered. The verdict of the jury was, "we, the jury, find the defendants guilty of grand larceny, as charged in the indictment, and recommend them to the mercy of the court."

The defendants moved in arrest of judgment, on the ground that it appeared from the records of the court in the identical cause, that the defendants had, at a former term, been acquitted on the identical indictment in the present case, of the identical and same offence of which the jury found them guilty in the present case, which acquittal was still of force, etc., etc.

They also moved the court to discharge them from custody, and to render judgment of acquittal, notwithstanding the verdict, of all the charges contained in the indictment, on the ground that the proceedings in the former trial were equivalent to an acquittal of the charge of grand-larceny, and the proceedings on the second trial were equivalent to an acquittal of the charge of burglary; whereby the whole case was at an end, etc.

The court overruled both of these motions and sentenced the defendants, in accordance with the verdict, for grand larceny.

The defendants appeal, and here assign for error—

1. Sustaining the demurrer to the plea of autrefois acquit.
2. Overruling the motion in arrest of judgment.
3. The refusal to discharge the defendants.

Thos. G. Jones and J. M. Falkner, for appellants.

1. None of the counts which did not charge the breaking and entry to have been felonious, or in the language of § 3695 of the Rev. Code, "with the intent to steal or to commit a felony," charge burglary. The breaking and entry may have been lawful, as where a man breaks into a house to extinguish a fire in the building, and afterwards commits a larceny. Where the intent with which the breaking, etc., is done, is not directly alleged, the court cannot say, as matter of law, that burglary is charged. A jury, on the facts charged in the third count, might find either a verdict of burglary or not as they found the intent. If this be so, all presumptions being solved against the indictment and in favor of the defendant, the court cannot hold that count as charging burglary. State v. Merrick, 19 Maine, 398; Arch. Crim. Pleading, vol. 2, p. 328; 2 Hale, 184. As to difference between alleging the fact of an unlawful intent and the facts from which it arises, see Bliss v. Anderson, 31 Ala. 625.

2. The verdict of "guilty of burglary," on first trial, operated an acquittal of all the charges of larceny. 3 Ala. 200; 6 Ala. 200; 28 Ala. 82.

3. A judgment, on conviction or acquittal, is not necessary in order that either may constitute a bar to another indictment for the same offence. 14 Ohio, 295; 5 Yerger, 24; 25 N. Y. 506; 44 Ala. 10; 43 Ala. 402.

4. Burglary and larceny are separate and distinct offences; neither is a grade or degree of the other. 2 Hale, 245; 46 Ala. 721; 24 Conn. 57.

5. These offences are not subject to the doctrine of merger under our law. Hamilton v. The State, 36 Indiana, 286; Whart. Am. Crim. Law, vol. 1, § 564; 29 Ala. 62.

6. The jurisdiction of the supreme court, on appeal, in a criminal case, arises from the statute and the waiver by defendant of so much of his constitutional right not to be twice tried for the same offence, as will give it the right to order retrial. The waiver will not be presumed to go beyond defandants' necessities. The appeal was not from the acquittal of larceny, but from the conviction of burglary. If defendants had been wholly acquitted, no court would have had jurisdiction of an appeal, and the principle is not different as to the offence of which the defendants were acquitted, because at the same time there was a conviction and sentence for another offence. Hurt v. State, 25 Miss. 374; 1 Bishop Crim. Law (Ed. 1857), § 677; 40 Ala. 14. There is no warrant in the constitution authorizing a court to require a defendant to barter away his acquittal as the price of the revision of an illegal conviction.

7. On the second trial defendants could not be retried for the offence of which they had been acquitted by reason of the verdict and proceedings on the first trial. They should have been tried for burglary alone. Campbell v. The State, 9 Yerger, 338; Martin v. State, 30 Wiscon. 222; Gilmore v. State, 4 Cal. 337; State v. Ross, 25 Missouri, 32; State v. Kettleman, 35 Missouri, 105; Gunther v. People, 25 N. Y. 406; State v. Tweedy, 11 Iowa, 351; Mounts v. State, 14 Ohio, 295; Morman v. State, 24 Mississippi, 51; 1 Swann, 14; 6 Humphries, 410; 2 Tyler, 471; 2 Va. Cases, 311; ; 8 Robinson (La.), 185; United States v. Keen, 1 McLean, 429; 8 Smedes & Marshall, 576; 4 Scammon, 168; 7 Blackford, 186.

8. No charge of grand-larceny being contained in the indictment, on the second trial, the verdict of guilty of grand-larceny on that trial was a nullity. It was no reason for the discharge of the jnry. That discharge was unauthorized and operated an acquittal of the burglary. Having been acquitted of larceny on the first trial, and the discharge of the jury on the second trial being equivalent to an acquittal of the other charge, the whole case is ended and the defendants entitled to their discharge. McCauley v. State, 26 Ala.; Ex parte Vincent, 43 Ala. 402; Grogan v. The State, 44 Ala. 10.

Attorney-General Gardner and Sayre & Graves, contra.

On an appeal of a case to the supreme court, and a reversal thereof, the case stands precisely as though a new trial were granted, or as though it had never been tried, and the court must try it over as it originally did, unless some count in the indictment is decided by this court to be bad.

In North Carolina and South Carolina, where a defendant is acquitted upon one count of an indictment and convicted on another, and appeals, if a venire de novo is awarded, it must be to retry the whole case. The State v. Stanton, 1 Iredell, 424; The State v. The Commissioners, 3 Hill, S. C. 239.

Where a defendant being indicted for burglary and larceny, according to the ordinary form, in one count, was acquitted of the burglary but convicted of the larceny, and obtained a new trial, it was held that the revision of the case pervaded the whole indictment, and that on the second trial he was to be arraigned on the burglary as well as the larceny portion of the count. State v. Morris, 1 Blackford, 37.

So the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania held, that after a new trial on a conviction for manslaughter, the charge of murder was reopened. U. S. v. Hardin, 6 Penn. L. J. 23; 1 Wall., p. 127. In this case Justice Grier says, to a party of prisoners who applied for a new trial, having been convicted of manslaughter in said court, "Let me now solemnly warn you to consider well the choice you shall make; another jury, instead of acquitting you altogether, may find you guilty of the whole indictment, and thus your lives may become forfeit to the law, * * * * * and when your solemn election shall have been put upon record, the court will hold you forever after estopped to allege that your constitutional rights have not been awarded to you."

In burglary and larceny, where, after the acquittal of the greater offence, but conviction of the less, a new trial is granted, the whole case is said to have been opened, and the defendant exposed on the second trial to the double charge. The State v. Morris, 1 Blackf. 37; Morris v. The State, 8 S. & M. 762; Esmon v. State, 1 Swann (Tenn.), 14; State v. Kittle, 2 Tyler, 471.

The decisions in this state, on which the defendants will rely, are The State v. Coleman & Owen, 3 Ala., p. 14, and Martin & Flinn v. The State, 28 Ala. 71. The point decided in these cases was not made by the record, nor did it come into question in either case. Besides, they are not applicable to the case at bar; these and all the other decisions cited by the defendants' counsel, it will be observed by the court, are cases where the conviction was of a lower grade of offence, and the court held that it amounted to an acquittal as to the higher grade of offence, and the authorities are by no means uniform as to this doctrine, and we do not think it the settled law of the land.

But the defendants do not cite a single case where a conviction of a higher offence is a bar to a prosecution for a lower offence, of a kindred kind, because the smaller offences are embraced in the greater. This is a conviction of burglary, as in the case at bar, and includes all the minor offences of a kindred kind; it includes that of grand larceny.

Take, for instance, the case of Stokes, which so recently engaged the public mind. He was first found guilty of the murder of Fisk; the case was reversed by the New York Court of Appeals. On a second trial, he was convicted of manslaughter. Do we hear of any plea on his behalf, on the second trial, that he was acquitted of manslaughter, by the first verdict, of murder? Do we hear of any motion in arrest of judgment on the above ground? Would the court have entertained a plea so contrary to all reason. Such a decision would be the abrogation of the criminal code. Take an appeal, as in the case at bar, on some technicality, have the case reversed, then plead a former acquittal as to all the counts in the indictment, except the one found on, then risk the jury finding on some other count; if they miss it on the first appeal, try it again and again, and finally it would be impossible to convict, it matters not what would be the magnitude of the crime.

The proposition asserted, virtually, by the defendants' counsel is, that two convictions are in fact an acquittal.

BRICKELL, J.—A paradox is a proposition seemingly absurd, yet true in fact. An instance is, that under the constitution and laws of Alabama, and under an indictment charging the defendant with two distinct felonies, two verdicts rendered at different terms of the primary court, the first expressly finding him guilty of one of the felonies, the second expressly finding him guilty of the other, may, when accompanied by an unauthorized discharge of the second jury, amount to an acquittal, and operate as such.

Section 9 of article 1 of our state constitution, provides: "That no person shall be accused, arrested, or detained, except in cases ascertained by law, and according to the forms which the same has prescribed; and that no person shall be punished but by virtue of a law established and promulgated prior to the offence, and legally applied."

Section 2 of article 6 of that constitution, is in the following words: "Except in cases otherwise directed in the constitution, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the state, under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to this constitution, as may from time to time be prescribed by law."

The restrictions and regulations as to the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court in criminal cases have been prescribed by law and are contained in chapter xii, title 3, part iv, embracing §§ 4302 to 4316, inclusive, of the revised code of Alabama. Section 4302 declares, that any question in law arising in any of the proceedings in a criminal case tried in the circuit or city court, may be reserved by the defendant, but not by the state, for the consideration of the supreme court, and if the question does not distinctly appear on the record, it must be reserved by bill of exceptions duly taken and signed by the presiding judge as in civil cases. By the sections of the code above recited, the defendant in any criminal case, but not the state, may take the case to the supreme court by appeal or writ of error; and in any case taken to the supreme court under the provisions of said chapter, no assignment of errors, or joinder in error, is necessary; but "the court must render such judgment as the law demands;" and if it reverses the judgment of the primary court, may order a new trial, or the discharge of the defendant, "or make such other order as the case may require." Rev. Code, § 4314, 4316.

In the language of Chief Justice Gibson, "our jurisprudence abounds with unreasonable advantages enjoyed by the accused. The least slip in the indictment is fatal; a new trial cannot be awarded after an acquittal produced by the most glaring misdirection; and the prisoner is to be acquitted whenever there is a reasonable doubt of his guilt. These, and many other unreasonable advantages, the law allows on principle of humanity or policy." * * * * * "But feeling, as I do, a horror of judicial legislation, I would suffer any extremity of inconvenience, rather than step beyond the legitimate province of the court, to touch even a hair of any privilege of a prisoner," etc., etc. The Commonwealth v. Lester, 17 Serg. and Rawle, 164.

The indictment here to be considered was found at the February term, 1873, of the City Court of Montgomery, and consists of four counts. The first count was nol prossed. The second charges that the defendants "broke into and entered a building," described in that count, "with the intent to steal." The third count charges that the defendants "broke into and entered a building," described as in the second count, "and feloniously took and carried" away certain specified articles of personal property of a specified third person, "of the value of more than one hundred dollars." This third count contains no averment as to the intent with which the defendants broke into and entered the building. The fourth count charges that the defendants "broke into and entered a building," described as in the second and third counts, "with the intent to steal, and feloniously took and carried away" personal property, as described in the third count, "of the value of more than one hundred dollars."

Under § 3695 of our revised code, which defines burglary differently from the common law, the second count is a count for burglary only, and does not include, nor authorize a conviction for the offence of grand larceny. Fisher v. The State, 46 Ala. 720.

Under the definition of burglary, contained in that section of the code, the third count is not a count for burglary, because it contains no averment that the defendants broke into and entered the building "with intent to steal or to commit a felony." An averment of the existence of the intent to steal or to commit a felony, at the time they broke into and entered the building, was essential to make that count a good one for burglary. Oliver v. The State, 17 Ala. 587; Ogletree v. The State, 28 Ala. 693; Moore v. The Commonwealth, 6 Metc. R. 243. As that count did not contain such averment, it is a count for grand larceny only. The fourth count is a count for burglary and grand larceny; and under it, the defendants might, on the first trial, have been convicted of either, or of both of these offences. But if they had been convicted of both, under that count, there could have been but one penalty, because, in that event, the merciful and just construction in favor of the defendants would have been, that as both offences were charged in the same count, they should be deemed as "one continued act," for which but one penalty could be adjudged. Josslyn v. The Commonwealth, 6 Metc. R. 236.

Under our code, burglary and grand larceny are distinct felonies of the same grade, subject to the same nature of punishment, and may be joined in the same indictment, but are not subject to the doctrine of merger. Johnson v. The State, 29 Ala. 62; Hamilton v. The State, 36 Ind. 286; Wilson v. The State, 37 Ala. 134; Whar. Amer. Crim. Law, vol. 1, § 564.

When the defendants were put on trial under this indictment, at the February term, 1875, of the City Court of Montgomery, and evidence as to their guilt was submitted to the jury, they were in jeopardy, both as to burglary and larceny; and might have been convicted and punished for both under the distinct counts of the indictment. Josslyn v. Commonwealth, 6 Metc. R. 236.

If, on that trial, the verdict of the jury had been, "we, the jury, find the defendants guilty as charged in the indictment," or, "we, the jury, find the defendants guilty of burglary and grand larceny as charged in the distinct counts of the indictment," they certainly could have been tried again for both burglary and grand larceny, after they had brought the case to this court and procured a reversal of the judgment of the city court.

But on that trial, the verdict was, "we, the jury, find the defendants, Richard Bell and George Murray, guilty of burglary." That verdict was received by the city court, and judgment and sentence thereon entered by that court, against the defendants, to the effect that each of them be confined in the penitentiary for specified periods.

The defendants thereupon took the case to the supreme court under the provisions of the code above cited. And at the June term, 1873, this court reversed the said judgment and sentence of the city court and remanded the case to that court "for further proceedings."

As the indictment was for burglary and grand larceny, and the verdict was only for burglary, the necessary intendment of the finding was, that the defendants were not guilty of the alleged larceny." "As to all which is not found, the conclusion must be that the jury intended to acquit." Nancy v. The State, 6 Ala, 483; Nabors v. The State, 6 Ala. 200; Burns v. The State, 8 Ala. 313; Martin and Flinn v. The State, 28 Ala. 71, and authorities cited in appellant's brief.

The legal effect of that verdict of acquittal of larceny, whether any judgment was rendered on it or not, was to put the alleged larceny as completely out of the indictment and case as if it had never been in the indictment or case. Mount v. The State, 14 Ohio, 295; Shepherd v. People, 24 New York, 406; The State v. Martin, 30 Wisconsin, 223; People v. Gilmore, 4 Cal. 376; Hurt v. The State, 25 Miss. 378; Campbell v. State, 9 Yerger, 333; 1 Bish. Crim. Law (Ed. 1856), § 676; State v. Ross, 29 Missouri, 32; Jones v. State, 13 Texas, 168; Morris v. State, 8 Smedes and Marshall, 762, and authorities in appellant's brief.

The case, when brought by the defendants to this court at its June term, 1873, had, by the aforesaid proceedings in the city court, become a case for burglary only. This court was bound to treat it as such; and in reversing the judgment and sentence of the city court, at the instance of the defendants, the supreme court had no jurisdiction to deprive them of the advantages which the law gave them as the result of the final verdict. The jurisdiction of this court, in the case as brought, was appellate only. As the case when brought here, had become one for burglary only, it remained a case for burglary only when remanded to the city court. Authorities, supra.

After the case was thus remanded, the city court, in effect, required the defendants not only to be tried for the alleged burglary, but again to be put in jeopardy for the alleged larceny, of which they had been acquitted as aforesaid. They were put on trial for both burglary and grand larceny, precisely as if there had been no former trial or former verdict. On this trial, at the February term, 1874, of the city court, the same evidence which had been adduced on the former trial was introduced, but the verdict was,

"we, the jury, find the defendants guilty of grand larceny as charged in the indictment, and recommend them to the mercy of the court." The city court received this verdict, remanded the defendants to jail to await sentence, and discharged the jury. No consent of the defendants to this discharge of the jury appears, and such consent cannot be presumed.

If this last verdict were of any validity, its undoubted effect and meaning in law would be, that the jury found the defendants not guilty of burglary. But that verdict is a mere nullity, because the charge of grand larceny had been put out of the case by the verdict and proceedings on the former trial. Fisher v. The State, 46 Ala. 721.

A verdict which is a mere nullity, is no legal reason for the discharge of the jury. And when, as here, that is the only reason for the discharge of the jury, and there is no evidence that the defendants consented to such discharge, the legal effect of such discharge is the acquittal and discharge of the defendants from any further prosecution for the offence or offenecs set forth in the indictment. Ex parte Vincent, 43 Ala. 402; McCauley v. State, 26 Ala. 135.

It is not the verdict finding defendants guilty of grand larceny on the last trial which acquits them of burglary. At the time of that trial, there remained in law no such charge as grand larceny in the indictment. That which acquits defendants on the last trial, is not the void verdict, but the discharge of the jury, charged with the trial of defendants for burglary, without necessity and without their consent. The void verdict had no effect. The jury should have been instructed to return to their deliberations. As the jury was not so instructed, but was discharged without a verdict on the only charge by law it was authorized to consider, and without consent of defendants, that dispersion of the jury operated an acquittal. So, on the first trial, when defendants were in jeopardy for both burglary and larceny, the discharge of the jury without rendering a verdict as to larceny, and without consent of defendants (although it did render a verdict as to burglary), operated an acquittal of the larceny. This is one of the strongest and most logical reasons for the rule, that where defendants are put on trial on several counts, and the jury find only as to one, the defendants are thereby acquitted as to the others.

It is a settled rule in this state, that the unauthorized discharge of a jury, charged with the trial of a defendant in a criminal case, is tantamount to his acquittal of all the alleged offences upon which the jury did not expressly pass, or were prevented from passing by the unwarranted discharge. From this rule it follows, that where two charges are contained in an indictment, and on the first trial there was a discharge of the jury without necessity and without consent of defendants before the jury had passed, and whereby they were prevented from passing on the first offences, that discharge is tantamount to an acquittal of the offence not passed on. If, on the second trial, the jury, which then, in law, are charged to inquire into the second offence only, are discharged without necessity, and without defendants' consent, that discharge operates an acquittal of the second and only remaining offence, whereby defendants are freed from the whole charge.

Strictly speaking, then, it is not the two verdicts against the defendants in the present case which operates an acquittal, but the unwarranted discharge of the jury on the last trial, as shown by the record.

We have been aided in our investigations of this case, and the important and delicate questions it involves, by the elaborate and exhaustive briefs of the counsel for the appellants, creditable to their industry and discrimination. To these we refer as containing the citation of many authorities not cited in this opinion, sustaining the conclusion we have reached.

The judgment of the city court is reversed, and a judgment must be here rendered discharging the appellants.

SAFFOLD, J., not sitting, being related by marriage to the prosecutor.

NOTE.—For the above highly interesting and important decision, we are indebted to Thomas G. Jones, Esq., the able reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Alabama, by whom it was prepared for publication as we print it, and as it will appear in a future volume of his reports.

Lawyers' Libraries.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—One of the greatest and most annoying difficulties which lawyers meet with in the preservation of their libraries, arises from the very general and unavoidable practice of borrowing, which prevails in all places except, perhaps, the largest cities of the country. While many books are doubtless lost by the carelessness of their owners, the great number which get misplaced from the negligence of those who borrow, is one of the sorest grievances of this much abused and long-suffering profession. It is one for the prevention of which very many devices have been planned and attempted, most of which have proved utter failures, and all of which are subject to countless objections.

If a lawyer, after great trouble and much ill-afforded expense, has succeeded in securing a good library, large or small, it is a constant laceration of his tenderest feelings to see his shelves gradually becoming depleted and his treasured volumes gone—he knows not whither. He may post up a flaming notice on his office wall, entreating his brethren, with the most touching earnestness, to "leave a memorandum of books borrowed," even adding, sometimes, an expression of his extreme readiness to allow his books to be taken, and may provide a neat little book, with a string and pencil, in which to enter the name and number of the volume taken in his absence; he may issue the most positive and overwhelmingly minute instructions to his office-boy to insist on requiring the borrower to make the entry or give his name and address so that the entry may afterwards be made; he may in his notice threaten the "utmost rigor of the law," if books taken are not punctually returned; he may do anything, adopt a thousand different plans, one after another, as his puzzled fancy may suggest, to save his precious books, but all in vain. The inexorable borrower prowls on among his treasures, in season and out of season, regardless of his entreaties and despair, until at last his rarest sets of reports are broken up, his most valuable text-books are missing without trace, and his once perfect and almost invaluable library is a mere wreck and shadow of its former glory; and every time "the law-book man" comes around, he must deny himself the pleasure and profit of buying some new book, "just out, the very thing he wants," in order that he may make good the depredations of the borrowers.

If he selfishly locks up his cases, he will soon have the unenviable reputation among his fellows of "a stingy fellow," and, moreover, cannot himself go out to borrow with a good grace, for be it known that he, himself, is a great borrower, withal. In other words, the practice is so common, so universal and so unavoidable, that none can say, as some pretend to do, that they "neither borrow nor lend."

The object of this communication is to suggest to the profession a remedy for this great and growing evil.

Let all the lawyers of a town or city unite in the employment of some worthy, quick and capable young student, whose duty it must be to make out and keep up a complete, classified catalogue of every library in the place. This catalogue should show every book in every library, its date, edition, editor and owner, and copies of the original (which should not leave the custody of the librarian), could be furnished by the librarian, at a slight cost, to every lawyer who desires it. It should be the duty of this librarian to make frequent periodical visits to each library, noting changes, loans and returns, books missing and found, and to "keep the run" of every volume, searching for those unaccounted for, and as far as possible, keeping all in their proper places. This labor, once reduced to a system, would be very slight, and the compensation therefor, contributed by so many, could be easily adjusted, and paid without hardship to any individual.

If there exists no law association through which the matter could be arranged, let some enterprising student take hold of it and secure subscriptions, or go on without subscriptions, and as soon as the utility and value of the plan is demonstrated, every lawyer who has the slightest feeling of regard for his books, or sentiment of justice and gratitude for a service rendered, will gladly join in the good work.

Besides this, the simple contact with the books, and acquired familiarity with their names, dates, editions, editors, authors, contents and relative value, will, in itself, furnish the librarian with a fund of information scarcely less valuable than his course of reading.

Trusting that I have not trespassed too largely on your space, and that good may result from my suggestion, I am, etc.,

A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES. By JAIRUS WARE PERRY. Second Edition, in two Volumes. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1874. Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, St. Louis.

It is gratifying to the pride of American lawyers to know that the bold undertaking of Mr. Perry, to produce a work that should rival the excellent English Treatises of Mr. Hill and Mr. Lewin on the Law of Trusts and of Trustees, has been successful.

Mr. Perry's work covers all the ground which is included in the English Treatises named, and he illustrates these subjects with the aid of American judgments, and in addition thereto his work embraces matters which are peculiar to the jurisprudence of this country. or have here received their fullest development.

The plan of Mr. Perry's treatises is comprehensive, embracing everything that fairly belongs to the Law of Trusts, whether gxpress or Implied, Resulting or Constructive, including Executory trusts, trusts under Wills, under Assessments for Creditors, under Mortgages and Deeds of Trust with power of sale, trusts for Infants and Married Women, for Charitable Uses, and for the benefit of Bondholders and Railway Mortgages, and other trusts which need not be here more particularly enumerated.

Of course the execution of this plan involves a discussion of the origin, definition and character of Trusts in the Roman and English Law, the Parties to trusts, and the Property that may be the subject of a trust, the nature of the Estate taken by the trustee, the powers and duties of trustees, and the remedies which they may apply and which may be applied against them.

All these subjects and others, which are subsidiary and incidental, are discussed by the author with a pains-taking care and accuracy, with a fullness of learning and precision of statement, that has placed his work in the very first rank of legal productions.

The vast extent of the field which Mr. Perry's labors embraces, is shown by the fact that his two volumes contain 1265 pages of condensed law, in which it is difficult to find a redundant statement or expression, or more than an occasional paragraph made up from quotations from individual jndgments.

The thoroughness and minuteness of the work is endorsed by the fact that the table of cases occupy 108 double-column pages, which is explained by the circumstance that it has been the purpose of the author to cite all the cases down to the date of publication, on the subjects treated. The reasons for doing this are satisfactory. In this country we have forty States, each making law and publishing judicial decisions. Besides this, there are the Federal Courts sitting in the various States, and the Supreme Court of the United States. In only the larger places can complete law libraries be found. Some towns have the Reports of one state, and others different Reports. The usefulness of a text book is much increased by a full citation of cases. If the citations are in exact support of the proposition to which they are adduced, they are worth more than the space they occupy, unless the proposition is so elementary as to be universally admitted, and so clear as to leave no doubt as to its extent and application.

We cannot conclude this meagre and brief notice of the work before us, without tendering our congratulations to the author, that the merits of his production have been so soon appreciated by the profession, and that this has led to so early a demand for a second edition. We could have wished it possible that the matter could have been put into one volume, for sake of economy and convenience, but a book of nearly 1300 pages, on good paper, cannot be handled, and since two volumes were found necessary, we venture to think they would have been yet more acceptable had the notes been more full of illustrations, judiciously drawn from well-considered judgments, of leading courts or eminent judges. But it is scarcely gracious, where so much has been furnished, to complain that more has not been given.

THE INTERNATIONAL REVIEW. Bi-Monthly. $5 00 per annum; single numbers $1 00. A. S Barnes & Co., Publishers, 111 and 113 William street, New York; 113 and 115 State street, Chicago.

The International Review, for January, will contain:

Judge T. M. Cooley's (of Michigan) "Guarantee of Order and Republican Government in the States," which discusses the legitimacy of the executive interference in such cases as have arisen in Rhode Island, Arkansas, Louisiana, and other states. This is one of the ablest articles that has yet appeared on this subject, and will be likely to attract wide attention in political circles.

Dr. McCosh's (of Princeton) "Ideas in Nature Overlooked by Dr. Tyndall." Marked interest has been evinced in this expected reply to the great Belfast address. Numerous extracts having appeared from Dr. McCosh's lecture and reported conversations, we desire to state that this article is written expressly for the readers of the International Review, and is a new, and the only original exposition of his views.

The Association for the Reform and Codification of the Laws of Nations, by Dr. James B. Miles, Secretary of the Association, Boston. A present and conspicuous need among nations, is a well-digested code of international law, and an International Tribunal to settle the differences of nations, not adjusted by the ordinary methods of negotiation.

The work undertaken by this Association, and its history, are of the utmost importance to the whole world, and no other American has a more intimate knowledge of it than Dr. Miles.

Vienna and the Centennial, is the title of a timely article by Prof. J. M. Hart, of New York. It is an intelligent description of that magnificent failure, financially, of 1873, and maps out some dangerous shoals for our centennial commission to avoid.

The following foreign articles are also of present importance:

A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF NELIGENCE. By FRANCIS WHARTON, LL.D., author of "Conflict of Laws," "Criminal Law," and "Medical Jurisprudence." Philadelphia: Kay & Brother, 1874. Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, St. Louis.

This is a new and comprehensive work of 880 pages, divided into 1001 sections. We received it some weeks since, but have refrained from noticing it until we could give it a careful examination. The result of that examination is the conviction that the work is one of extraordinary merits. It differs in its mode of treatment from the excellent practical treatise of Shearman & Redfield, which is devoted almost exclusively to an exposition of the law of Negligence, as developed in the common-law tribunals of Great Britain and this country. On the other hand. Dr. Wharton has produced a work intended to be thoroughly practical, and at the same time philosophical. All that has been said of value on the subject of Negligence in the Roman law, and by the modern jurists of continental Europe, is given by the learned author, and in addition the views and judgments of the eminent judges and writers of the two great countries which have the common law for the basis of their jurisprudence.

The most valuable feature of the work is the successful manner in which the author has combined original and philosophical discussions, and the results of the best thought and reflections of the great jurists of the civil law, with a full and minute view of the adjudicated cases in England and America.

None but a writer of Dr. Wharton's learning and experience in the preparation of legal works, could have produced such a treatise as the present. Nothing seems to have escaped the diligence of the author, who even cites cases as yet only published in the current legal periodicals.

It is impracticable, in the limits of a notice, to descend into details, but we may remark that the author's chapters on the Master's Liabilities to and for Servants, on Contributory Negligence, including Injuries to Children, on the Negligence of Railways and other Corporations, are noticeably thorough and valuable.

One of the most marked features of the work is the demonstration of the author that the three degrees of negligence which Sir Wm. Jones and Lord Holt have done so much to engraft upon the common law, have no basis in the Roman law, and is a refinement which the practical sense of the modern judges has repudiated.

After the luminous and learned exposition of the author on this subject, no one can hereafter doubt that the doctrine of culpa levissima (slight negligence as a ground of actionable liability) is derived from the speculations of scolastic medieval jurists, and not from the Roman law, and that it is now practically discarded in England and America, and is, in fact, a subtlety which cannot be applied to the practical affairs and business of life.

The author's conclusions on this subject, which affects the whole doctrine of negligence, are thus stated:

"§ 58. (1.) That the doctrine of a third grade of culpa (negligence), called culpa levissima [or the omission to ward off every possible casuality, the antithesis of the most exact diligence], is taken by Lord Holt and Sir William Jones, not from the classical Roman law, which was the law of business Rome, but from the scholastic jurists, who dealt with the question as belonging rather to speculative than to regulative jurisprudence.

"(2.) That by present authoritative expositions of the Roman law, it is rejected.

"(3.) That while it lingers still in Anglo-American text-books [notably Story on Bailments], it is practically dropped by Anglo-American courts

"(4.) That it is incompatible with the necessities of business jurisprudence.

"(5.) That the classification into two degrees, culpa lata (gross negligence) and culpa levis (slight or special negligence), is sufficiently exact for all philosophical purposes and sufficiently flexible for the purposes of practical jurisprudence."

In executing his plan the author divides his work into three books. The first, containing eleven chapter, treats of the General Principles appertaining to the subject. The second, divided into twenty chapters, treats of Negligence in the discharge of duties based on contract. The third, comprised in twelve chapters, is devoted to Negligence in the discharge of duties not based on contract

We may observe, before closing, that the author falls into a slight error in one respect in giving the substance of the interesting case of Kellogg v. Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Co., tried before Miller and Dillon, JJ., in the U. S. Circuit Court for Iowa, at the May term, 1874, and first published in the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, June 4, of that year. In this case the defendant company owned a steam ferry boat (the Jennie Brown), and an elevator more than 100 feet high, constructed of pine, situated on the bank of the Mississippi river. During an unusually high wind blowing in the direction of the plaintiff's lumber yard and mill, distant 388 feet from the elevator, the saw-mill and lumber yard took fire from the burning elevator, and were destroyed. The plaintiff's action was for the value of the mill and lumber thus consumed, and he alleged that the defendant's negligence caused the elevator to catch fire, and that this was the immediate or proximate cause of his loss. The defendant's negligence was alleged to consist in the omission to use "spark-arresters" on the chimney of the Jennie Brown, and in not using due care, in view of the violent wind then prevailing, in working the boat while in the immediate vicinity of the combustible elevator, to prevent sparks from coming in contact with it. The author states (sec. 154) that "the defendant was clearly guilty of negligence in not having spark-arresters to his smoke-pipe." This is doubtless a true proposition of law with regard to railway locomotives, running in settled regions of country. Ib. sec. 874. But on the trial of the case of Kellogg, the evidence tended quite clearly to show that spark-arresters could not be successfully used on the boats navigating the Mississippi, and that from necessity they had to be abandoned. Under the testimony, it was left to the jury to determine whether the neglect to use them was negligence, and the jury in finding for the plaintiff, must, under the evidence, have proceeded upon some other ground than the one that "the defendant was clearly guilty of negligence in not having spark-arresters to his smoke-pipe."

We have not space further to extend our notice of this most interesting and valuable book. It will add to the already distinguished name of its author, and the work, surpassing in the richness of its materials, and in masterly and exhaustive treatment, the English treatises on Negligence, by Mr. Saunders and by Mr. Campbell (both published in 1871), cannot fail to give him an enviable and enduring European fame. We unreservedly commend it to our readers, not only as a work of immense learning, and abounding in acute and philosophical discussions, but also as one of great practical, every-day value.

Summary of our Exchanges.

Middleton v. New Jersey, etc., Railroad Co., Chicago Railway Review for Dec. 5, has the following syllabus: The New Jersey statute, which provides that where the property of an insolvent corporation, in the hands of a receiver or trustees appointed under the original act, is incumbered with mortgage or other liens, the legality of which is brought in question, and the property is of a character materially to deteriorate in value pending the litigation thereupon, the court of chancery may order the receiver or trustees to sell the same, clear of incumbrances, at public or private sale, for the best price that can be obtained, bringing the money into the court of chancery, there to remain subject to the same liens and equities of all parties in interest as was the property before it was sold, and to be disposed of as the said court by its decree shall order and direct,—pronounced constitutional.

White v. Freedmen's Bank, Sup. Court, Dist. Columbia, Washington Law Reporter, Dec. 1: 1. Leased premises were used as a hotel, and the lessee executed trust deeds on the furniture to secure the parties from whom he purchased, and to other creditors. Subsequently the landlord accepted in lieu of the lessee, another tenant, who bought out the lessee and assumed the payment of all rent in arrear, and of all liens upon the furniture. Upon the faith of this agreement, the tenant paid all the back rent, and the rent accruing for some time afterward, to the landlord. He also paid off a large portion of the claims secured by the deeds of trust. Held, that the balance due upon such trust deeds had priority over the landlord's lien for rent, and that there was a change of tenantry as well as of property in the furniture.

2. A landlord will lose his lien by conduct which misleads bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration.

3. Where trustees have money in their hands, claimed by a landlord upon his lien for rent, and by creditors having trust deeds on the furniture on the rented premises, a bill of interpleader will be sustained when the fund is not sufficient to pay both.

Norment v. Fastnaght, same court, same journal:

An expert cannot give his opinion, whether upon the face of a conveyance of real estate, it covers the premises in controversy.

Ex parte Dewitt C. Baxter, same court, same journal:

1. An improvement described in the claim as "The combination of the hearth-plate of a portable furnace with wrought-iron tubular legs connected together, all substantially as set forth," does not indicate, in any degree, invention. It is simply the result of the judgment and knowledge which is expected of every competent mechanic, and is not patentable.

2. The properties and advantages of hollow wrought-iron legs as supports for a structure, being well-known, to substitute them for solid legs in a portable forge, is but the application of knowledge already possessed by competent mechanics, and does not require invention.

The same journal publishes a decision of the secretary of the interior, with the following syllabus: 1. A state selection has the effect of an entry of the land selected, and withdraws the tract from further disposal.

2. Although a state selection be abandoned, yet all settlements upon or entries of the tract, prior to the cancellation of the selection, are illegal.

Crighton v. Kerr, Sup. Court United States, Legal Gazette, December 4: A withdrawal, "without prejudice to the plaintiff," of a general appearance entered by an attorney for the defendant, means that the position of the plaintiff is not to be unfavorably affected by the act of withdrawal; that all his rights are to remain as they then stood. Hence, where there has been error in the beginning of an action, as ex. gr., one of foreign attachment, by reason of want of notice required by statute to be given to the defendant, and an attorney appears generally for such defendant, and so cures the defect, the advantage thus given to the plaintiff is not taken away by a withdrawal declared to be "without prejudice" to him. And the court states that it does not intend to intimate that the result would have been different had the appearance been withdrawn unconditionally.

Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Co. v. Chicago and Pacific Railroad Co., United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin, same journal, opinion by Drummond, J., holding:

1. Where the legislature of a state has not declared in what particular way one railroad shall cross or intersect another, but has only referred to it in general terms, then it may be competent for a court of equity to control the railroads as to the crossings.

2. Where a corporation is created by another state, although it may be associated with a corporation in this state, and their interests be common, a court of equity can protect the interests of a joint proprietor in property that is being injuriously affected.

Com. v. Hartranft, Pittsburg Legal Journal, Dec. 2: Jurisdiction of Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, under the new constitution.

Simonds v. Boston, Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, same journal: 1. Under the statutes 22d and 23d Car, 2, where the damages found by the jury in an action of trespass, are under the value of forty shillings ($5.33½), the latest time when the judge can certify that the freehold or title of the land mentioned in the declaration was chiefly in question, to give a plaintiff full costs, is at final judgment.

2. Where the trespass to the land or freehold is laid as the principal cause of action, and the asportavit of that which has been made personal property by severance, is laid in aggravation of the trespass, full costs do not follow without the certificate.

3. Where the asportavit and conversion of that which has become personal property by the act of the trespasser, is laid as a separate and distinct claim, although the plaintiff goes on to charge a trespass on the land, it does not bar his right to recover full costs without the certificate.

4. The Narr. charged that the defendants broke and entered a certain island and close of the plaintiff, and that they seized, took, and carried away ten thousand bushels of sand (of which the island was partially composed) of the value of five hundred dollars, and converted and disposed of the same to their own use; and that they also injured and despoiled the island, etc. Verdict for plaintiff for $5.00. Held, that the court below was correct in entering judgment for full costs.

Tatty v. Freedman's Trust Co., Supreme Court, District of Columbia, Washington Law Reporter, December 8: 1. A claim against the late corporation of Washington, commonly called a voucher, consisting of a bill for work performed by plaintiff for the corporation, together with certificates of the proper officers, that it was duly approved and allowed for the sum of $6,096.75, is not strictly a commercial instrument; but where it has been endorsed in blank by the plaintiff, and delivered to a broker as security to raise money, and no mark put on it to designate a wish to control it, or to restrict the endorsement, and a paper of this kind is extensively used for the purpose of borrowing money: Held, that he could not maintain replevin to recover the voucher from an innocent bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, without tendering him the amount paid therefor.

2. Where the plaintiff made his promissory note for $3,000, payable to his own order, and endorsed it and delivered it to a broker to get discounted, giving him the voucher as security; and the note was discounted and the proceeds paid plaintiff; and the broker claimed that the voucher was given upon agreement that he might sell and dispose of it at any time for 90 cents on dollar, and the plaintiff claimed he was not to sell it until after maturity, and non-payment of the note; and the broker sold it to the defendant before such maturity, for a valuable consideration, and without any notice or knowledge of such arrangement. Held, upon this state of facts it was proper for the justice who tried the case below, to instruct the jury to return a verdict for defendant, as there was no proof of tender before suit brought.

Ex parte J. L Pennock, same court, same journal: 1. If a chain is attached to a shaft rotated by the same mechanism as the rolls in a rolling-mill, other end being furnished with grappling-irons, by which the heated pile drawn from the furnace, and placed upon a platform suspended from a crane, when it is swung by the crane to the rolls, the whole machinery constitutes the proper subject of a patent. Wylie and Olin, associate justices, dissenting.

3. And a patent is valid which describes such machinery, and contains the following claim, viz: "In a rolling-mill, the revolving shaft with its drum-chain and grapple, or any equivalent power-driven hauling mechanism, in combination with a crane, arranged and operating in connection with the said mechanism to receive the fagot from the same and deliver it at the rolls." Wylie and Olin, associate justices, dissenting.

3. Whether the inventive faculty has been exercised, is a question of evidence, and is always to be considered in reference to the condition of the art and the result accomplished; and where the combination is new, and the benefit great, the presumption is strongly in favor of originality.

The same journal publishes a decision of the secretary of the interior, holding that when a claim, under the pre-emption law, is defective in the matter of citizenship, such defect cannot be cured by the retroactive effect of the United States statutes, if an adverse right has intervened.

The Albany Law Journal, for December 12, has an article by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., of Chicago, Ill., on Limitations of Claims Against Estates. It publishes a long extract from the opinion of the New York Court of Appeals, in the case of Tilton v. Beecher, holding that a bill of particulars in an action for criminal conversation is a matter of discretion with the inferior court. It has an extract from the Irish Law Times, on the Duties of Carriers in the Protection of Goods; and contains its usual amount of other interesting matter.

The Chicago Legal News, for December 12, prints an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Strong, in the case of the Ship Belle of the Sea v. Higgins. This was a proceeding to enforce a bottomry lien, and the court hold that there was no evidence of actual payment, as claimed by the owners, and that the ship was not discharged from the lien unless there was actual payment of the bond, or unless the libelants agreed to pay it and look to the freights, the general average, and the insurance, exclusively, for their reimbursement.

It also prints the opinion of the New York Court of Appeals in the Tilton-Beecher bill of particulars case.

It also prints an opinion of the Circuit Court of Peoria county, Illinois, Tipton, J., holding that the city council of Peoria, has the power to determine when and where, and the expediency of, the location of the street-railroad of the city; that their determination, without fraud, is final, and the courts cannot interfere by injunction or otherwise; that under its charter the city has power to authorize onehorse railroad to locate its line upon and over the road of another company; that a company so authorized has authority to condemn the right of way or use of such other company's road for the necessary use of its cars, and that the county court has jurisdiction of such condemnation proceedings.

It also prints an opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, in Culver v. Third National Bank of Chicago. This was an action of assumpsit, in the Superior Court of Cook county, brought by the Third National bank of Chicago, claiming to be a creditor of the Northwestern Glass Company, against Howard Z. Culver, alleged to be a stockholder in that company. It was agreed there were many other suits depending on the decision of this, and the court therefore, gave it careful consideration. The court hold, that the act of 1867, under which the glass company was incorporated, was intended by the legislature as a substitute for the act of 1849, they at the time having the whole subject fully before them, and this being so, the stockholders are primarily liable by section nine of that act. It is also held that a creditor may pursue his remedy at law against a stockholder.

It also publishes an opinion of the same court, Sheldon, J., stating under what circumstances abstracts of title may be received in evidence in place of original deeds.

The Legal News contains considerable other interesting matter of minor importance.

The largest vote was on an amendment, which provides additional security against bribery at elections, the whole number in its favor being 459,658, and against it 179,891.

—HON. EDWARD P. COWLES, formerly a justice of the Supreme Court o New York, died in Chicago on the first instant. He was admitted to the bar in 1839, was appointed to the bench in 1853, and was re-appointed at the close of his official term. Retiring at the close of his second term, he resumed the practice of the law, in which he was very successful. He died from a hurt while returning from a visit to California.

—JUDGE JAMESON, author of the work on constitutional conventions, has written a letter to the Chicago Tribune, in which he says distinctly, "I think it established, in the public law of the United States, that it is always in the power of a legislature to call a convention whenever it may deem it necessary or expedient to do so with a view either to amend or remodel the constitution." The only exception he allows is an express prohibition, by the constitution itself, of the exercise of such a power.

—JUDGE DURELL'S resignation will make five United States district judges who have left the bench within the past eighteen months, the other four being Sherman of Ohio, Delahay of Kansas, Story of Arkansas, and Busteed of Alabama. We wonder that they do not all resign. We do not see what there is to stay for. Certainly it is not the salary, and as to the honor, there certainly is not much honor in being judge of a nisi prius court of limited jurisdiction, if it is for life. And then to be tied up for life to an office from which you cannot get away long enough to go a-fishing, It is too much greatness.

—SIR JOSHUA ROWE, K. C. B., for many years Chief Justice of Jamaica, died in London last month. He was appointed chief justice in 1832. He was then a young man. At his decease he was nearly eighty years of age. He was remarkable for his upright conduct as a judge and the general correctness of his decisions. A few years ago he retired on a pension, when he was succeeded by the Hon. Bryan Edwards, who received the honor of knighthood on the occasion.
